School discipline

The brutal attack on a 70-year-old high school pupil was a manifestation of lack of respect towards authority that must be regarded as a danger signal in the community.

It was only coincidental that the incident was concurrent with the arrest of four high school girls on drug charges not far from the school. But the fact the latter arrests followed by only a day the arrest of two youths on the same charges at the same location is another indication of youthful disdain for enforcement authorities.

The unconscionable attack upon the elderly guard, John Kunzman, has shocked many in the township. A veteran of five years of protecting school children at local street crossings, Mr. Kunzman was guiding smaller youngsters across the street in front of the high school when he was pelted with apple cores from a group of teenagers sitting on the high school steps.

When he remonstrated with the group, one of them grabbed the guard, ripped his collar and tie and finally punched him in the mouth in the ensuing scuffle, Mr. Kunzman's dentures were broken and it required several stitches to close the gash in his mouth.

While the blow itself may have tempered youth, the overall picture of youths harassing school guards, wearing Cranford Police Department issued uniforms and commissioned to protect the lives of young children is most disturbing.

With complaints regarding discipline in the junior high schools preceding the recent transfer of the two principals, and in the light of the recent developments at the high school, the time appears ripe for consideration by the Board of Education of an overall study of discipline problems at post-elementary school levels. If undertaken, it should be by a group of qualified citizens not identified with either the local educational or enforcement organizations.

Discipline difficulties are confronted by all school districts and the problems that exist here are found in other communities as well. Unfortunately, the transfer of school principals does not attack the root of the problem. A serious, objective effort to do so could contribute to a better understanding of the problem and perhaps point the way to a solution.

The unfortunate recent incidents should not be permitted to overshadow the fact that many young people who are products of the community are developing into responsible citizens. It is vital to the community that steps be taken to make certain the standards set by these youngsters are the ones that will prevail in the school system.

Bicycle accidents

The recent record number of bicycle accidents involving motor vehicles, coming as it did hard on the heels of the Bicycle Safety Alert, is indication of a letdown in attention to the rules of bicycle safety in spite of township's unique program.

A directive by Police Chief Matthew T. Haney last weekend produced a roundup of close to a dozen unregistered bikes and nearly 150 violation warrants by police. Hopefully, the drive will reduce the toll of mishaps.

In apparently takes strict enforcement—along with the educational program to correct bike infractions. A number of the accidents involved older youngsters who are less impressive than younger ones receiving instructions as part of the alert.

AS WAS POINTED OUT at the Bicycle Safety Board, almost all of the record number of accidents in April involved violations. A majority were caused by cyclists riding the wrong way in traffic lanes, and others going through traffic signals, cutting across traffic and making improper turns.

It is the aim of the Cranford Bicycle Board and of police to alert youths and adults alike to the hazards of careless cycling before a serious or fatal accident does so. It requires the cooperation of both parents and children to be effective.

Natures Notes

By FARRIS SWACKHAMER
June is the time when the young birds are out on the business at hand, which growth after the winter preparations, spreading buds, blossoms, opening leaves.

Many of the birds are ready for the hay-makers. Pigeons that were downed by spring beating and blizzards are now spangled with blue, purple, and white feathers. The petals fall, and the seeds are ready to be sown.

The flood of warblers has passed on to the north, only a few of these tiny birds remaining to nest nearby. June is a month of laying and incubating eggs and raising young. A young bluejay begging from its parents is a familiar sight. One blue jay was even thinking of coming winter yesterday. He was searching out acorns in our garden and burying them against the cold to come.

Some Kentuckies breed in the northern part of the state. At one time this bird was fairly common but now it is rather rare.

Another bird, it resembles a dove but with wings shorter than tail. The male has white tail patches and both sexes have black throats. You may almost step on this fellow.

Letters to the editor

Bicycle alert

To the editors:
Thanks to all who assisted with Cranford's third annual Bicycle Safety Alert. We noticed a significant improvement in the behavior of the 10th and 20th grade students in the bicycle skill tests in the traffic unit shown by the 10th and 20th grade students. Many of the students have been practicing bicycle safety and it shows in their confidence and ability during the tests. The continuing, progressing classroom instruction in bike safety and the bicycling demonstrations by physical education classes have given many Cranford students the knowledge and ability to bike safely by the rules. We hope they will choose to use these skills when sharing the roads with other traffic, and that their parents will reinforce the lessons at home and when biking as a family.

Although many communities are adopting bicycle programs, we are sure that Cranford is unique in the intensity of interest and cooperation shown by police, schools, elected officials, and local newspaper, community organizations, and volunteers committed to actually doing something about bicycle safety. This is a commendable commitment to bicycle safety education and enforcement.

Everyone seems to be pulling together to make the River Carnival on June 6 a success, with different groups making floats, and booths selling soft drinks, and other items.

Also the churches and the temple of the community are sponsoring special worship services with a Bicentennial theme. It would be a part of Cranford and an happy that everyone is so enthused about the Bicentennial.

Symphony pushes survival efforts

S.O.S. (Save Our Symphony) is the slogan adopted recently at a board meeting of the Suburban Symphony Orchestra of New Jersey, to develop a Bicentennial theme.

How can the Symphony meet the responsibility of its next decade? Should the Suburban Symphony Orchestra continue to be the home base of the Orchestra?

Where does the future of the Suburban Symphony Orchestra lie?

The meeting, held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Ammann here was devoted to answering some of these questions, and the reorganization of goals of the organization.

Discussion before the annual meeting of the Suburban Symphony Orchestra of New Jersey, to develop a Bicentennial theme.
