All this takes much longer to accomplish than it does to record, but by the time I finally reach the hall, the firemen have arrived, and are battering in the street door with their hatchets. I see two of them enter and come towards me. Then I am done for, I suppose, for a great giddiness seizes me, and I do not know what happened next. After such a sensational episode any de-tailed account of the end of my "holiday in town" must fall rather flat. Let me net attempt to give it then; what the ultimate and happy climax to it was, must, like the rest of one's private affairs, be inferred. All that concerns the reader lies in a nutshell. Knowing that her mistress would be out that night later than usual, the nurse, join ing company with the only other servant, together with my friend's housekeepler, the three went forth on their own devices, locking up their respective houses, as is sometimes the playful habit of such retainers. The fire was soon extinguished; but not before it had done a vast amount of damage: how it originated is not quite certain, but we suppose that little Ernest, who is a sid young turk, got out of bed and upset the night-light, and then in terror crawled under the table, where I found him nearly choked. His sleeping little sister was quile senseless for an hour and more after size was rescued, and the experts in such mat-ters declared that another few minutes in those sufficienting fumes would have put both children beyond mortal aid.
