THE MARRIAGE OF VALERIEN KOCHANSKI.

(Translated from the French of M. Sacher-Masoch). CHAPTER V.

kielene had chosen the afternoon for her lesson. As soon as it was over tea was served. Now, it happened every time that Valerier was asked to remain, he refused, timidly at first, and ended by consenting. Then he told anecdotes illustrating his recital with lively skatches, which he drew with the pen with great skill, or he would read Dante or Aglosto when he was not singing some duo with Helene.

M. De Festenburg rejoiced at the turn matters were taking; the mother found the matters were taking; the mother found the pretended Italian each day more agreeable, and as for the young will, the phid his attention to her realings, but when the hand of the clock inhomiced the arrival of Vallerien her heart beat double quite. The Jew profiled by every occasion that presented itself to raise the reputation of Kochimist.

The compling raised present Valerien at every opportunity, and M. de Festenburg replied to him in a way that covered the replied to him in a way that covered the object of all this enthusiasm, who was present with confusion. The more reserve and delicacy her Italian master affected, the more Helene's Italian master affected, the more Helene's kindness to him increased. She went so far as to betray herself in a private journal. The journal always marks a new era in a young girl's life; up to this point infantine innoceace; beyond, love. This love is born, grows, and flourishes insenably, and its perfume axiales like incease. Here are some fragments of Helene's journal:

"Since he has come, my life, as well outward as inward, has completely changed. It seems to me that the sun shines in the

I. Who dare scorn you? 'Is it you who speak thus, Mademoiselle, you?' I esteem you shoorely,' said I, with eagerness, for each word came from my hears, and my sympathy is as boundless as my trust. He did not allow me to finish; seizing my had, he pressed it to his lips and fled, leav ing me quite upset; his line were feverish, they were like fire. How is all this to end? This last sentence that I have written is absurd. My thought hovers around him in his little room and consoles him in it as a guardian angel. At present I know—no, I wish to know nothing, to reflect upon nothing; I wish to hide nothing. I shall let myself float with the tide. It is so sweet The day after Helene wrote this last page of her journal Weinseb came to announce that the Professor was ill; in fact he did not come. At the tea hour Helene appeared quite prooccupied; all at once she rose, ran to her room, shut herself up and burst into tears. The next morning she begged M. de Festenburg to go in person to inquire after her teacher. The good fellow did not walt to be asked a second

American Audiences at a Lecture. -Mr. Arthur Mursell gives an amusing —Mr. Arthur Mursell gives an amusing account of his first experience as a lecturer in the United States. "I stepped upon the platform at Tremont Temple, Boston, under the auspices of the Peace Society, amidst a crowd of local celebrities, with fear and trembling, not ill-pleased to see a goodly company before me, and not discouraged by the decorous silence, only occasionally broken, with which the assembly received my speech. I had been sembly received my speech. I had been told before I came to America that I must not expect any applause, but that if any one in the audience cried out "Bully for you, old hoss!" I might consider my reputation won. I was disappointed of this articulate encouragement both at Boston and at New York, but on appearing on the platform of the Young Men's Christian Association, in the 'Association Hall' of the latter city it was a gratification to find one's re-marks received pretty much as they would be in England, with warm and generous responses. There is certainly little regard paid o formalities, for the chairman seldom does more than call out your name by way of introduction; and before I had considered in what terms I should propose a "vote of thanks' to him for his 'able conduct in the chair the entire assembly had made a stampede, leaving me alone with a glass of ced water, and a man lowering the gas-lights so fast that I was afraid I should

According to the French Code .-The duties of seconds occupy much space in the Count de St. Thomas's indispensable is of no skill with his weapons, while the other is a master of the foil or pistol, we gather that the seconds may try to arrange matters even on the ground. They should not allow either party more than a minute to aim, but a wounded man is allowed two minutes; after which he is out of the game. A quarter of an hour's delay on the ground is quite grace enough to give an unpunctual duclist. In a fight with subre or rapier, no one should be permitted to parry with his hand; it is as illegal as the coup de botte, or "leg before wicket" in England. The old school of fence permitted the use of a dagger in the left hand, for parrying. In a sword duel, the seconds are armed with big sticks to enforce their decisions. In fight ing with pistols the distance between the parties should be 15 paces. M. Gambetta rights at 30 or 40 paces; it is more statesmanlike. The pistols should be equally strange to both parties. The length of parrel must be the same in both weapons. When once on the ground the principals bow politely; that is all they have to do till the seconds have completed their arrangements. The seconds must feel the bodies of the men to see that they carry nothing which might break the force of a bullet. results. The banker had been struck in a portmonnaie full of gold, and his adversary ongratulated him on "the skillful investment of his money." After both parties have promised to comply with the articles of battle, the second says, "I warn volu that at the word armer you must cock your pistols, and that honor forbids you to fire before I say tirez." The men are then placed, the word armez is given, and after a few seconds, tires. The combatants fire in succession; the first has a minute in which to aim, and the second a minute after the other pistol has gone off-two minutes, if he is hit. This is the manner of the stationary duel. It really seems as if the combatants must generally be rather nervous, for it might be thought next to impossible to miss an object the size of a man at 15 paces with a minute allowed for aiming. The duel au signal we recommend to peaceful souls averse to bloodshed. From 25 to 85 paces separate the opponents. The signal to fire is given by one of the seconds clapping his hands thrice in half a minute. In this duel the principals fire simultaneously, and it is rather a snap shot at best. To fire too soon or too late is to commit a felony. If one man has fired and the other reserves his fire, the seconds

Among the Republicaus there is quite a division of sentiment as to choice of candidates. At present it appears as if it will fall either to Grant, or Blaine. Grant has the support of the skilled party manipulators such as the Camerons and Conkling and also of a large and influential number whose relations.

The whole country suffers from this state of things. A little while ago we clipped from a Philadelphia appears as if it will fall either to Rahway as to the Quaker by Senator Edmunds, of Vermont. The money was paid to compensate citizens of the United States for damages sustained through injuries.
