The following from the Elizabeth Journal comes to what strait financial matters have come to in this city. "There will be a meeting of the police court soon, to present the urgency of their case before Council at its next meeting, and it is pretty difficultly understood that if they get no pay they will resign their positions. At present they are not allowed to do work outside the strict duties of the force. The council have been obliged to violate these rules in order to live. They cannot work longer without money, and will be forced to take up some other business."

An accident, which might have proved fatal, happened to a young man this city on Thursday morning last; he was performing on a horizontal bar when he slipped and fell from it. He landed on his head and from his head to the floor nearly a yard. He was taken to the hospital, but he has broken his neck, but after some minutes he awoke somewhat, and then it was found he had bitten off part of his tongue. Some friends around began to console with him, when they were some-what surprised to find him saying, "I don't mind anything, I swallowed that piece of tongue."

GAZETTE IN NEW JERSEY.—The last Legislature of this State amended the game law relative to woodcock by making the season close until Sept. 1st, instead of July 1st, as formerly. This change is made to give the birds a chance to increase in size, as they are not always gone by the 1st of July. This law the Bergen Co. Association for the Protection of Game and Fish is determined to see enforced. It will also enforce the law passed at the last session, making it unlawful to shoot gray or black squirrels before September 1st. The Union County Association will doubtless take action also, if they have not already done so, to see that the law is enforced.

ately lowered and rose again, but it always frightened. In the mean time, the doomed house went on imploringly; but through all the other noises the most awful sound was the cracked voice of the crazed inmate, quivering on, coming nearer to the window where John Dixon was—
"My refuge from the stormy blast,
And my eternal home."
A new crash echoed forth, a further portion of the interior had tumbled. Up went the flame still higher. The house seemed to quiver in the mingled light and gloom. David had risen in the heat to warn his young master for the last time to leap, for in a moment, all pruned to be over.
Suddenly, a voice as shrill as the crazed lady's, but clear and musical as a bell, rang over the waters.
"Aunt, it is Willie. Won't you come?"
A slender boy, with a look leaning over the side, was struggling bravely with an eddy, not forty yards from David, and Kate's brother was in it. Then a subdued cheer, by way of encouragement, rose from two other boats behind. David saw that in the center of these were the boat to which John Dixon's father, two of his servants, and, standing in the stern, was the old rector, his white hair streaming on his shoulders. He it was who was directing the others. Waving his arms, he made a signal to the other boat to David, for the latter had shouted that he had Miss Stillers' safe. The aged rector called—"Stoprowing, men! Let the boy go home, and God's blessing on him. One life risked is enough. Struggle, William; remember, she is your relative. Spread out the oars, he's finally added, "to recover them, if he's not going to reach."
The youthful rower had not slackened in his efforts for a moment. At times a current or eddy for which his young arms were to weak caught him, but he soon escaped it; he was making way, leaving the others behind, leaving urging on his boat towards the flaming house.
"Shout! she hears you," called David, away on his left hand. From his nearer position he noticed that the aunt's stinging had ceased.
Again, though now brokenly from the exertion with the oars, the childlike rector voice rose exultingly: "Aunt, if you will not come, I will be drowned too!"
The advancing boat had reached an illuminated part of the waters, and the waves began to glitter and recede, could see the boat, like a dark patch, zig-zagging towards the Grange, through two windows of which the glowing fire was visible, making, as it were, a scarlet curtain to the flames all at once lowered; it was only to shoot up still higher. In the same moment, a third window shot into illumination from behind, and in its aperture two forms were seen. The front of the house stood; it did not fall; the dark spot, which they knew was Willie's boat, went zig-zagging on. Soon it gained the water, and it vanished for a second. But they saw a bright spot moving forward still.
The old rector, who, standing erect with clasped hands, had been praying in a nearly silent voice, gradually raised his tone, supplanting Heaven's favor for the lad. "Amen!" burst from the others; that was the only sound, for their efforts were straining as they gazed. If the Grange now gave way, then Willie would perish with the rest. Willie seemed to elapse; then one of the figures in the red glaring window stirred. With hearts sick with terror those in the boat saw this figure buoy with something which must be the rope. The figure trembled; it grasped the other form; they were leaving the scarlet square of the window; they were descending.
A struggling cheer went up from the boats, but it was checked in the first shout. A few simultaneously struck all the noise might bring down the glittering burning house. Another moment passed.
"They are safe!" was cried, in a shrill female voice. It was Kate; she had rallied, and recovered consciousness. "I see the boat; it's younger son, see—there!" Striving forward, with her hands disengaged, she stretched fully out, she pointed to a moving spot, half dark, half shining.
Now up went an unstrained shout from each boat, and their occupants sprang into motion. Again, and yet again, they shouted. Then a fresh cheer stood still, even as the storm struck the water, for, at the third repeated shout, the glowing dwelling collapsed; the windows crashed together; slowly all sank; falling sideways to the left, a widening cloud of flame, smoke and sparks opened over the spot; then, the bright waters were instantaneous-ly hoisted out in darkness, saying where scattered red timbers floated for a moment. The Grange was gone!
Pushing on through the hot, blinding, stifling dust vapor which came sweeping down upon the wind, they found, on reaching clearer air beyond, that Willie had done his task—John Dixon was dead, and the crazed out of his boat—the poor man, weak and exhausted, was now quiet as a baby.
A few minutes later there was more cheering on Prospect Hill road, when the saved persons were landed there. The house from the Grange had been seen on the hill in Nettley village, and quite a crowd had assembled from far and near. Among them was Mrs. Sibbert, waiting in a mother's agony for her children. She had them both safe again. Though all had not Willie long, for he was raised on strong man's shoulders, and borne exultingly up the road to the Prospect House.
When the food subsided, the green fields again appearing, there scarcely was any trace that the Grange had ever been, so perfect was its destruction. Even the cellars and foundations were filled with fire brought down by the torrents. Hardly a vestige of the dwelling was left.
Miss Dismal's mind was long in fully recovering the wreck which the sudden sliding herself face to face with the destruction of her loved old home, and the crippling of her means, had given it. But, by and by, a new Grange arose; not on the site of the old one, although that was now made safe by the embanking of Red Hill Gully. The new mansion appeared itself in a dell quite as snug as the other, but higher, under the fir plantation. Mrs. Sibbert and Miss Dismal lived there with their families. Kate has gone away; she lives in a suburb of the county town for her husband's greater business convenience, his father having quite retired from trade.
John Dixon is quite willing that Willie should be the hero of the event, commemorated with the destruction of old Nettley Grange. He is himself contented that he has Kate.
