They came J. HENRY STONE, within view of the city on Sunday weary with travel and sorely hongered. The road they came has been overworked. The erstwhile hospitable farmer now sets his dogs on the wayfaring man instead of welcoming him to his family. Through this departure from the customs of the fathers, they walked and ate not. Thoroughly discouraged at their repeated failures to procure food, they yet concluded to make one more trial on this beautiful Sunday morning, and cautiously entered the yard of a decent farm house, peering about them to see that Tower did not come suddenly around a corner | Tuey knocked on the front door; so response. At the side door no answer. They went in. There was not a soul a home. A table spread and a most substantial meal was before them. It was like a dream from the Arabian Nights. The dinner was doubtless awalting the re turn of the family from church. The pedestrians fell to, and their knives and ecution. As they were finishing the feast a knock was heard. Bruce went to the door. There stood two tramps, who asked for something to eat. Bruce in a rare spirit for something to eat. Bruce ma rate spirit, of mischief, questioned them closely in regard to their travels, and fibally asked them if they would chop wood for their dinner. They answered yes. He then took them to a wood-pile in the rear of the house, and they went to work. Bruce and Flood, filling their pockets, stole oul of the side way from the house and went to a neighboring hill, where they had a full view of the wood-pile and the toiling tramps. There they gloated over the picture. The owner of the farm house, with a coveral iductions, and two stalwart sons. several daughters and two stalwart sons, arrived on the scene, the devastation of the dinner was discovered, and the two sweating tramps at the wood pile were seized as the depredators. All was seen by the two on the hill, from the arrival of the family to the ignominious expulsion of the wood-

Two AFFEOTIONATE RIVALS. - There were several men clustered around the stove of a Galveston saloon, and somehow of other the subject of newspapers came up for discussion. One man said that editors were more jenious of each other

"Where did that happen?"
"It happened in a Western Texus town where I lived," signed the young man;
"I hid dashed off a little poem of ten or fitteen centos about Beautiful Spring. There were two rival papers la the place—the Bugle and the Trombons. I had heard that the editors were deadly enemies, and the Buglo and the Trombons. I had heard that the editors were deadly enemies, and sighed to shed each other's gone, and I was alruid if I let the Trombons publish it first there would be a deadly encounter. I finally resolved to have it appear simultaneously in both papears. When I called on the editor of the Trombons he said that the editor of the Trombons he said that the editor of the Buglo had a large family, and that he would prefer it to appear in the Buglo, as personally he loved the editor of the Buglo. I went to the Buglo had not be will be said the editor of the Trombons was his warmest personal friend, and he would be
