THE WORST OF EVERY ONE.-It is so easy to get into the way of thinking the worst of our friends and neighbors that one should guard against a habit of detraction with all one's might. It is painfully depressing to be with those who habitually speak evil of others. One feels in a charmed circle of hopeless iniquity, if it be not one of delusive appearances. . Everything is had throughout, and there is not a square inch of virtue left for our weary soul to rest on. People whom we have loved since we were children are shown to us as iscamed and scarred with iniquities, and unworthy our most tepld & regard. Names that we have venerated are stripped of their laurels and crowned with weeds and straw, or made out to be the mere shadows of names, if indeed they are not the shadows of foul substances; our pet illusions are sneered at and life is stripped of its poetry. People given to detraction can never find a possible excuse, a charitable reason, for anything they do not quite agree with, like or pn. derstand. Buy they see some one they know under conditions admitting of two explanations - one supposing doubtful taste or discretion, the other compatible with perfect innocence and purity of thought and motive; you never hear them give the latter interpretation, or accept it when offered to them.
