Now you know, to bring out whatever is good in him, a man must have something for which to strive—some object above and beyond him, to be at once Yes, I suppose so," said Constance; but is not this to be found?" "Many people find it easily," he answered, with a slight accent of contempt; "but they are readily satisfied.

I do not find it—I mean that my life heretofore has not found it—because the aims that satisfy most men do not satisfy me. I search for Egeria, perhaps. Do you know where she is to be found?" The look that accompanies this question says more than a volume of speech, and Constance thrills with that mingled sense of danger and pleasure which gives a subtle zest to episodes of this kind. It is not a vulgar flirtation, but her, that she is the supreme object of a playing lightly with issues which may be fraught with gravity; a warding off seriousness, because feeling that the time for it, has not yet come.

"Why can we not stay here? We see the fall without the trouble of climbing "You may stay, if you like," said Constance. "You will make a very picturesque object alone on this rock in the middle of the river. I shall tell you how you look from the upper fall." With a merry laugh, she turns away, and before he can answer, is helf-way across the river, springing lightly from stone to stone. He has no alternative but to follow, his vexation tempered by amazement, and a dawning sense that there is to be even more piquancy in the affair than he has reckoned on, said Fred, "I think the half of them ner expresses!"

They rejoin the rest of the party at the upper fall, and an hour or two is spent in dimbing over rocks. Finally Miss Cranston proposes luncheon, and with somewhat exhausted energies and very good appetites the party assembles in a romantic spot by the side of the brawling stream. Here they discussed with much relish, bandwiches and cold chicken, jellies, etc., when a sound is heard which carries consternation with it—a long, low, distant roll of thunder. it-a long, low, distant roll of thunder. is very much like buying a house. You cannot tear down the lath and plaster to see what sort of material has been used inside, nor can you rip a suit to pieces to note the interlining, the staying, or what in general terms may be called the "fixings" of a garment. Hence the necessity of buying of a firm on whose words you can rely instead of trusting only to general appearances.

We may not know much about house property, but what we do not know about Clothing nobody else does, and what you may not know about any garment we offer for sale is not worth knowing. We want your custom; not for to-day alone, but for all time, and if plain statements of facts, fair dealing, added to prices which cannot be equaled elsewhere can obtain it, we mean to secure it. Our stock is in every respect worthy of your inspection.

Write for samples, prices and self-measurements.
