I met Major March as I was leaving Cisborough, and had the pleasure of riding a mile or so with him. He asked me, if I saw you again, to let you know that he had gone on to Scar-

"Indeed!" said Charteris, without any indication of surprise. He felt little interest in the announcement, for Major March may come or go now, so far as he is concerned. He mounted his horse almost as soon as Mr. Belmont had dismounted, and with scant adieux, rode away. "He was in a very bad temper at not finding his horse, papa," said Grace, quietly, as her father came to where she "Very likely, my dear," replied Mr. Belmont, calmly, "He is a young gentleman subject to fits of bad temper when things do not suit him. But what brought him back, when he said that he did not mean to come?" "I don't know answered Grace the prudent. "He only mentioned that he met Constance, and took a walk with "And she sent him back here!" said Mr. Belmont, with a laugh. "She is a sensible girl, and knows how to keep things smooth at home. But I think Mr. Charteris will have some good reason for his bad temper before long," he added, with a complacent nod, as he walked into the house. A prophet could not have spoken more truly, for Charteris had reason for very bad tempers before he was many Major March happened to be a man without the faintest shade of dissimulation; and it would have been impossible for him to meet his kinsman as if no change had come over his feelings towards him, when, in reality, he was filled with wrath and indignation. In his first greeting Charteris sees this, and divines what is to follow, and what did follow speedily. His host is not a man of many words, so the reproach, when it comes, would be keen, and the charge direct. Its very directness makes it almost impossible to evade it, were Charteris disposed to do so; but he is not. To-night, at least, he is reckless, ready to avow the worst, ready to say, "If this be tree and, make the worst of it!" And as is natural, his candor somewhat disarms the elder man. "Yes." said Charteris, "your instinct, or your information, is correct. I have behaved like a scoundrel, I suppose, and you may call me one if you like. That is, I have fallen in love with Miss Melfort, and I have made love to her least. That is how the matter stands person; which ought to be, no doubt, a solid and substantial comfort to me, but is rather the reverse; for if she had neknowledged that she loved me, I should as certainly break my engagement with my cousin as I stand here now." "And do you think that would be honorable conduct?" asked Major "Who can tell?" replied the other. "It is hard sometimes to know where

It is not in the least likely that he thinks of marrying her. He can hardly keep his head, financially speaking, above water now.

The wind is said to be "tempered to the shorn

Some believe this to be so, while others regard it and kindred sentiments as the "taffy" which the prosperous deal out as consolation for the less fortunate in the fact that the prices for Men's and Boys' Clothing are tempered to the necessities of those whose means lead them to economize. And if you are ever so rich. is it sensible to pay from $3 to $5 a suit more elsewhere than we ask for the same article? This looks well enough in an advertisement you say.

Yes, but the printed statement does not express the fact with one half the force that our goods and prices do. If you will favor us with a call, we know we can demonstrate to you every statement we make.
