Golden Text, Matt. ziv., 12-Memoriz [From Lesson Helper Quarterly, by permission of H. S. Hoffman, Philadelphia, publisher.] Notes.—At that time, i. e., of the preceding chapter, Herod the Tetrarch, or Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great; Tetrarch in strictness of meaning, is the ruler of the fourth part of a kingdom, but sometimes, a here, the third part, or Galilee and Perea. Fame, or reports about his mighty works. His servants, or the officers of his court Herodias, granddaughter of Herod the Great V. 1. These words seem to intimate that New York. Herod had just then heard of the great works of Jesus. It seems that now, at last the officers of his court had just begun to talk about him, and wonder who he could doing his great works and speaking his wonignorance on the part of Herod and his great men shows very clearly at how great a distance they were living from all high and Jesus, and Heroil undertook to enlighten them about Him. This great teacher, with whose fame the land was now ringing, was not Jesus at all. It was John the Baptist, whom dead, and who therefore had power to do these great works. Now this declaration of The power of a guilty conscience; and the wide spread belief in the resurrection; and knew that he was a murderer. He knew that John was an upright and holy man, and that truth and right were on his side. Yet he knew that to please an adulterous woman he had shamefully put him to death. Is it a wonder he could not rest? If such a man as Herod could hold the doctrine of the resur rection, its place in the popular mind must have been well assured. At least it must have been widely discussed, as indeed the mere existence of the Sadducees, who denied the doctrine, proves it to have been V. 8-5. Here lies the secret of Herod's great disquiet. And the links in the chain of events are these: Herod had repudiated his own lawful wife and was living in adultery with the wife of his brother Philip. John had fearlessly rebuked him for his great sin, and, of course, had incurred the bitter enmity of Herodias. From that day he was a doomed man, and nothing but fear of the people restrained Herod from putting him to What could John do? Just what he did He must be "clear in his great office," and rebuke the offender. Publicly rebuke him. The sin was before the people and so must its condemnation be. At all hazards he must be true to his Lord's words. And so must the minister of Jesus now. He must not only "exhort." but he must "reprove and rebuke," and that too "with all authority." And how ready was Herod's response. "He would have killed John." No thought of breaking off his sin by righteousness or his transgression by turning to the Lord. John was the transgressor here. And so the burning and shining light in Israel must be put out and the greatest of the prophets of the Lord borne to a bloody death in order that an adulterous woman might be gratified in Yet all through John was stronger than he thought. Herod feared John. He knew he was a prophet, and the sanctities of a spotless character shut him in on every side. V. 6, 7. The "birthday," here, probably means the anniversary of his accession to power. It was usual for kings to observe this day with great pomp—as Herod doubtless did on this occasion. This "daughter of Herodias" was Salome, her daughter by her first husband. She must have partaken of her mother's character, for no modest female would have made such an exhibition of herself before such an assembly. Knowing him as she did, was this all planned by Herodias. to bring about her long plotted revenge on John? Inflamed by wine, by music, by the brilliant surroundings of the feast and the dancing girl, the king bound himself with an oath to give her whatsoever she desired— Mark adds, "even to the salf of his kingsired. And it was well improved, too; for, "the head of John the Baptist." What a request for a young girl to make. What sathat prompted it. What aptitude in hateful he had not expected it. But in the madness. him to do even if he could. And so the command was given; John was beheaded and his head presented to the damsel, who in turn presented it to her mother. The whole ghasty business is done, and John lies headless is V. 13. The news was not long in spreading His disciples heard of it, and with reverent and affectionate sorrow took up his body and buried it, and "went and told Jesus." Now, there is something very beautiful in this. Their former jealousy of Jesus, for John's sake, seems to have died away; and they told him of the danger that might reach even to him. Of course they knew not the secret tie that bound them together. They knew not that as it fared with John so it would with him, whose coming John heralded. They knew not that John's bloody death in his prison was but the index finger pointing to Jesus on the cross. Still they went and told 1. The power of a guilty conscience.—Is this a foretaste of future retribution? Herod could not get away from the presence of John. He was with him everywhere, A could not bear to look upon his thirty pieces of silver, and "went out and hanged himself," to get away from the vision. 2. The binding power of an oath.—In this sense an oath is an appeal to Almighty God, to do or not to do a given act. And what power has it! If the act in view is right, 10,000 oaths cannot increase our obligation to do it, because it rests on the will of God, which is truth in itself. And if it be not right, noth-
