By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. CHAPTER IV.—Continued.

The doctor's view was naturally different. That gentleman never wearied of the sound of his own voice, which was, to say the truth agreeable enough to hear. He now had a listoner, who was not so cynically indifferent as Anastasie, and who sometimes put him on his mettle by the most relevant objections. Besides, was he not educating the boy! And education, philosophers are agreed, is the most philosophical of duties. What can be steal when you were there r' more heavenly to poor mankind than to have one's hobby grow into a duty to the state? Then, indeed, do the ways of life become ways of pleasantness. Never had the doctor seen reason to be more content with his endownents. Philosophy flowed smoothly from his lips. He was so agile a dialectician that he could trace his nonsense, when challenged, back to some root in sense, and prove it to be a sort of flower upon his system. He slipped out of antinomies like a fish, and left his disciple marveling at the rabbi's depth. Moreover, deep down in his heart the doctor was disappointed with the ill success of his more formal education. A boy, chosen by so acute an observer for his aptitude, and guided along the path of learning by so philosophic an instructor, was bound, by the nature of the universe, to make a more obvious and lasting advance. Now Jean-Marie easy to convince a boy, whom you supply was slow in all things, impenetrable in others; and his nower of forgetting was fully on a level with his power to learn. Therefore, the doctor cherished his peripatetic lectures, to which the boy attended, which he genermore vigorously determined to be pleased:

The law of growth is health and favorable conditions. All healthy things grow. For confirmation of this fact look at your little boy in his last year's suit. This law of growth is as true of a business as it is of a tree. Our own business is a striking illustration of this; if we may judge by the manner in which it continues to expand it is in a most healthy condition. In casting about to find reasons for this, we sometimes attribute it to one thing and sometimes to another. It is not the amount of puffing in the newspaper. It is not to be found in the alleged extraordinary inducements offered by our competitors. Still there is a reason why public patronage continues to increase. What, then? body! If they slept how could they see that it was the disciples who stole the body! The disciples had no motive in stealing the body.

They knew well that in doing such a deed those jealous Jews, who had crucified their leader, would not spare them. Why should they court danger and death from the Roman soldiery! Then how could they after-
