The collector called on the man who came first to pay his dues. He proteinded to sub- mit his basket of watermelans to the inspec- tion of the officer, but the latter, on ap proaching, suddenly falt his threat touched by the sharp point of a dagger. The companion of the man carrying the basket had just drawn his hand from be neath his jacket, and cried out, in a voice of thunder: "Back with you! from today the people	creasing noise of the tocsin continued to summon forth from every part the regged population of the fanbourgs, armed with stakes, forks and boat hooks. All this pant- ing, furious and foaming crowd joined Ma- saniallo after falling on the viceroy's troops from behind. At this moment the lansquenets, recognizing among Corcolli's band some of their former companions in arms, went over to them, and soon put the Castilian arguebusiers to rout. Then was heard the voice of Masaniallo. "Stay! stay!" cried he, "kill no more! Our enemies are put to flight, and we have vanquished!" "Long live Masaniello?" was heard on all aides. "And now," said Masaniello, mounted on a platform which had been erected hastily, let us thank heaven for our victory, for it is to heaven that we owe it!" And the crowd knelt down in the blood that it had just spilled. "Brothers," continued he, "it is now time for us to proclaim our rights!" "Mo more taxes!" "We delegate you to procure the restora- tion of our rights." "I accept the office," replied the young man, "and I swear to prove myself worthy of it." "Worke," said he, "what I dictate." The artist knelt down on one knee and wrote three decrees. Two hours after, a curious scene occurred in the interior of the city, in the market place, and before the very office of the cus- toms, which had been reduced to ruins. The collector and his officers, who had been driven away the day before, returned early in the morning to resume their functions, escorted by a company of Insquenets, who had been sent on purpose to protect and de fend them. The officers, visibly incasy, set about pro- paring to receive the market dues. In about an hour, a number offinen, while had the corrige a basket of truth had at his side a companion who carried in this boson, seened to chips an offensive arm. The collector called on the man who came first to pay his dues. He proteinded to sub- min the state of watermelans to the inspec- tion of the officer, but the latter, on ap proaching, suddenly falt his threat touched by the sharp point of a dagger. The collector called on the man who came first to pay his dues. He proteinded to sub- mit his basket of watermelans to the inspec- tion of the officer, but the latter, on ap proaching, suddenly falt his threat touched by the sharp point of a dagger. The companion of the man carrying the basket had just drawn his hand from be neath his jacket, and cried out, in a voice of thunder: "Back with you! from today the people	creasing noise of the tocsin continued to summon forth from every part the regged population of the faubourgs, armed with stakes, forks and boah books. All this pant- ing, furious and foaming crowd joined Ma- suniolo after falling on the viceroy's troops from behind. At this moment the lansquenets, recognizing anong Corcelli's band some of their former companions in arms, went over to them, and soon put the Castilian arquebusiers to rout. Then was heard the voice of Masaniello. "Stay! stay!" cried he, "kill no more! Our enemiest are put to flight, and we have vaquished!" "Long live Masaniello!" was heard on all sides. "And now," said Masaniello, mounted on a platform which had been erected hastily, "let us thank heaven for our victory, for it is to heaven that we owe it!" And the crowd knelt: down in the blood that it had just spilled. "Brothers," continued he, "it is now time for us to proclaim our rights!" "No more tares!" "We delegate you to procure the restora- fion of our rights." "I accept the office," replied the young man, "and I swear to prove myself worthy of it." "Long live Masaniello!" "Long live Masaniello!" "Long live Masaniello!" "Mataniello signed to Salvator Ross to mount the platform. "Write," said he, "what I dictate." "Be threat knelt down on one knee and wrote three decrees. The first re established the charter of Charles the Fifth; the second declared null the ordinances of the viceroy which imposed an erorbitant tar on wine and spirite; and the third abolished every kind of tax on fruit and fish." Balvator read the decrees, which were re ceived by the crowd with frantic applause This done, Masaniello raised his hand. "Brothers!" Though vanquishers at one place, we are not so at all. We must go to the viceroy and treet with him as between one power and anöther."	"The tocsin! It is not the bosin, Conde?" "It is, mi sener," murmared Badajoz, in a voice of terror. "And who has ordered it to be sounded?" "Nobody?" "Guards, there?" cried he violently throw- ing the arms aside. The officers of the Spanish regiment im- mediately rushed in from the anto-chamber, where they were waiting for orders. "You hear, gentlemen?" continued the viceroy. "These wretches have dared to gound the tockin. They will cast alarm everywhere, througbout Naples and all the surrounding comtry. Hasten to your daty, and let not one of these relds escapol. No mercy in o quarter?" He fell into in arm chair, murmuring; "Holy Madounat they must be masters of the shifts dity. Listan-the bells of several churches are tolling. I hear the great bell of St. Januarium-there, gol-what are you doing here-go, I say, and let me know what is passing." Badgos rushed from the chamber, but was immediately called back by his master. "Hun first," cried ba, "and bring me my daughter, isabella." After the departure of the minister of police, the fidks went and carfully examined a servet door made in the wall. He then called three major-domi and ordered them to secrets, in some subterrance places how, his diamonda, his gold and siver place, and every precious object the place contained. Isabella, half dead with torror at what she had seen and haserd, had just returned from the cahin on the Mergellina, when the Come de Badajot came to lead her to be father. She could harms, wald. "My deart child, I can secount for your terror. Oh were the crime of the poly of the planess of your cheet, I would have so pity for them, and grant them neither pardon nor mercy?"	"But suppose I do not love him," repeated the young girl, bearing unfinchingly her fathet's angry looks, "will you still force me to give him my hand? Will you still force me to give him my hand? Will you still force me to give him my hand? Will you still force me to give him my hand? Will you still force me to give him my hand? Will you still force me to condemning me to etarnal despair!" "But why did you not tell me this before? Why wait till this fatal moment to make such an announcement?" "You never consulted me." "You never consulted me." "You never consulter ought to accept the choice of her father." "Yes, when that choice entails no misery." "Habolla." exclaimed the duke passion- stely, "you shall obey me, I tell you! The question at present is not about your mar- riaga. I will listen at some other time, to your objections, and shall duly consider them; in the meantime, you must look upon Don Juan Fernandez as a friend of our family, to whom I send yon, so that you may be out of the reach of danger." "I beg of you, father, not to compel me to tell you a third time that my resolution is unchangeable." "By our Lady?" exclaimed the duke, selfing his daugtice by the arm, "you shall leave, and instantly." "Be collect, father, that I am a womah!" said isabella. The duke, ashemed of his brutality, with drow his hand? "But give me your remons," and he; "in the mame of heaven, give me your reasons," She looked her father fall in the face, and said: "I am isabells d'Arcos. The honder of the vicetory of Naples is dear to me, and I remain with him, so that history may never be able to eny: 'He possensed a beart of stome and soul roid of pity, for he used the most refined torture to put to desith those unhappy men whom distress and hunger had 'driven 'to rebellion." "Yes," answered Isabella. "How do things go on? asked the duke. "Mean, the most vigorous remains the being prepared, and throus minappy men	polics.
