of life. The man Templeton was young strong, in health, and in a moment he had been struck down and was dead. He walked the streets late at night himself at times, and the same fate might as easily have been his. But this manifestly was not a murder for the purpose of rob bery. And was it a wanton blow struck in sheer wickedness through lust for blood? Hardly such things do not occur in our civilization. There was a motive for the act, a strong one doubtless. The discovery of the motive would lead to the discovery of the murderer. The first effort of the police would doubtless be to discover that motive
