Flora's night had been no happier than Missy's. She was very fond of her cousin Nicholas, in a way, and through the darkness and silence her sentiments un- derwent a reaction in his favor; but it was a reaction in which Dosia had no share whatever. Nicholas's 'marriage was, in Flora's opinion, an injury not to be forgiven by any of his family; but she found herself wishing that, somehow, the consequences of that rash step might be visited upon Dosia alone, who was— so Flora believed—alone to blame. Do- sia, as a clever and useful dependent of Mrs. Herry (that cousin of the Thornes on whom Miss Elvira leaned for guid- ance in all perplexities), was wellenough, Flora thought. She had grace, she had beauty, she had a fair education and pleasing manners, and Flora was quite willing to concede that if Cousin Myr- tilla Herry chose to advance her protege, Dosia might lay claim to some notice from the social world of Tallahassee— but married to Nicholas! The thought was intolerable. And the day would surely come—Miss Flora was convinced —when Nicholas himself would bitterly repent it. Surely some way might be devised by which the secret marriage might be secretly dissolved, and Nicho- las freed from the bonds into which he had allowed biuself to he antrapped	in spite of his pride, in spite of his will. "What?" he said, at last, with angry emphasis, and pushed the child roughly. "What infernal nonsense is this?" he de- manded, as if of the room at large; and then his gaze fixed itself upon Flora. It was the first black look he had ever given her; but her face was hidden, and she did not see it. "What absurdity have you been putting into the child's head, Flora?" he said, severely. "A jest of this sort is simply scandalous." "Tain't her!" cried Missy, with shrill impetuosity. "Brer Nicholas is done married a'ready to Dosia—I heard him tell my cousin Flora." Nicholas at this instant entered the room. Flora looked at him and saw that he had heard. His face was pale, but he did not flinch. "It is a lie!" said the colonel, fiercely.
