"It is true," said Dosia, with smiles and tears and blushes.

Miss White picked up her broom and went to sweeping off the porch. She made two comments mentally, one in reference to Dosia's mother, the other to Dosia's father: "She must a-turned plum fool befo' she died;" and, "he's got 'em to tote, I see." Nicholas and Dosia sat down on the long wooden bench that constituted the only furnishing of the little passage, Miss White, glancing over her shoulden saw them there, and sho immediately slammed the front door. It was Miss Elvira's wish that Gilbert should depart on his mission without the knowledge of the rest of the world a Thorne Hill: therefore she herself took him his "pass" in the dark of the even ing stealing out of the house with heavy covered basket, under the weight of which she could hardly stagger. "I've brought you your pass; Gilber he panted; "and some provisions. Yo are to return to morrow and bring wor vou know. Be sure you put some pro-

Now Missy, hidden in the clump of Palma Christi that ornamented the front of old Gilbert's garden, had heard the whole of the conference between these two. When it was concluded she crept out and hurried to the house, over the garden fence, fired with the wild resolve to run away with old Gilbert and join her brother. She made up a small bundle of her clothing and hid it under the wardrobe, and when she went down to tea she secreted a biscuit by way of provision for her breakfast. Her next idea was to lie awake all night in order to rise with the dawn on the morrow, to which end she insisted upon hearing Glory-Ann's whole repertoire of zoological legends; but in spite of this, Missy slept the sleep of a tired child. When she awoke the glimmer of the dawn was in the east and Glory-Ann was snoring on her palherself, which she never yet had done. last it was accomplished. Her shoes and stockings she took in her hands, with her little bundle, and stole softly and swiftly down stairs. As she could not unlock the hall door, she climbed out of one of the dining room windows, and ran down the lane to old Gilbert's cabin. Alack!

it was shut fast, and the ox cart was not under the shed. When Missy comprehended that Gilbert was gone, she threw herself on the ground with a scream of rage and disappointment; but presently she re- husbed; it was as if Mawse Nicholas had flected that if this attempt at flight should be discovered, every possible means would be taken to prevent her any future occasion that might offer; perhaps even she might be looked up and fed on bread and water, like a little girl in a story she had read; and however decided Missy might be as to dying of starvation, she had no mind to live on breac and water; so she made haste back to the house, and was lucky to get in unseen. Glory-Ann was still snoring, and Missy stuffed her bundle under the wardrobe again, tore off her clothes, and curled Toward sundown Miss Roxanna White, sitting on the top step of the porch, and enjoying her evening "dip" in solitude, espied the ox cart coming along the road. You Can't Match 'Em.

Anybody can sell chean goods. To sell good goods cheaply,—ah! there's the rub. Environment has much to do with that. If I lad to add as much to the cost of every piece of furniture I sell, to help pay rent, as the New York furniture man has to, why, you'd have to pay me more than you do now. I do business at Jersey City, you see; 56 Montgomery street, and so I sell just the same quality goods as you would buy in New York for prices such as—well, you can't match 'em, that's all. Better come and see me. Cars from all ferries pass my door, and my name's
