gained upon me with unaccountable rapidity—he appeared suddealy within ten yards of my heels The others were at least a hundred yards behind. I had nothing for it but to turn round, let him almost run against the muzzle of my air-gun, pull the trigger, and see him fall in his tracks. It was the work of a second, but it checked my pursuers. They had heard no noise, but they found something that they did not bargain for, and lingered a moment, then they took up the chase with redoubled fury. But I had too good a start; and where the path joined the main road, instead of turning down towards the town, as they expected I would, I dodged round in the opposite direction, the uncertain light this time favouring me, and I heard their footsteps and their curses dying away on the wrong track. Nevertheless I ran on at full speed, and it was not till the day was dawning that I began to feel safe and relax my efforts. The sun had been up an hour when I reached a small town, and the little locanda was just opening for the day when I entered it, thankful for a hot cup of coffee, and a dirty little room, with a dirtier bed, where I could sleep off the fatigue and excitement of the night. I was strolling down almost the only street in the aftermoon when I met a couple of carabineers riding into it, and shortly after encountered the whole troop, to my great delight, in command of an intimate friend whom I had left a month before in Naples. "Ah, caro mio/" he exclaimed, when he saw me, "well met. What on earth are you doing here?-looking for those brigands you were so anxious to find when you left Naples? Considering that you are in the heart of their country, vou should not have much difficulty in gratifying your curiosity."

"I have had an adventure or two," I replied, carelessly. "Indeed that is partly the reason you find me here. I was just thinking how I could get safely back to Ascoli, when your welcome escort appeared; for I suppose you are going there, and will let me take advantage of it!" "Only too delighted; and you can tell me your adventures. Let us dine together to-night, and I I am afraid my account of the episode with which I have acquainted the reader was not strictly accurate in all its details, as I did not wish to bring down my military friends on poor Valeria, so I skip-ped all allusion to her and my detention in her home; merely saying that I had had a scuffle with brigands, and had been fortunate enough to escape under cover of the night. As we passed it next morning I recognised the path which led up to Valeria's cottage, and shortly often aboved that young woman inp to Valeria's cottage, and shortly after observed that young woman herself coming up the glen.

"Halloa," I said, with great presence of mind as she drew near, "my lovely model, I declare. Just you ride on, old fellow, while I stop and ask her when she can come and sit to me again."

"You artists are sad rogues,- what chances your profession must on Valeria, and rode discreetly dn. "There is nothing to be afraid of, lovely Valaria," I said in a low tone, as I lingured behind! "be sure I will never betray either you or your rascally—hem! I mean your excellent Croppo. By the way, was that man much hurt that I was obliged to trip up?"

"Hurt! Sauta Maria, he is dead, with a bullet through his heart. Croppo says it must have been magic; for he had searched you, and he knew you were not armed, and he was within a hundred yards of you when poor Pippo fell, and he heard no sound."

"Croppo is not far wrong," I said, glad of the opportunity thus offered of imposing on the ignorance and credulity of the natives. "He seemed surprised that he could not frighten me the other night. Tell him he was much more in my power than I was in his, dear Valeria," I added, looking tenderly into her eyes. "I didn't want to alarm you, that was the reason I let him off so easily; but I may not be so merciful next time. Now, sweetest, that kiss you owe me, and which the wall prevented your giving me the other night." She held up her face with the innecence of a child, as I

"I shall never see you again, Signor Inglese," she said, with a sigh; "for Croppo says it is not safe, after what happened the night before last, to stay another hour. Indeed he went off yesterday, leav-ing me orders to follow to-day; but I went first to put your sketch-book under the bush, where the donkey fell, and where you will find it."

It took us another minute or two to part after this; and when I had ridden away I turned to look back, and there was Valeria gazing after me. "I ositively," I reflected, "I am over lead and ears in love with the girl, and I believe slie is with me. I ought to have nipped my feelings in the bud when she told me she was his wife; but then he is a brigand, who threatened both my ears and my tongue, to say nothing of my life. To what extent is the domestic happiness of such a rutian to be respected?" and I went on splitting the moral straws suggested by this train of thought, until I had recovered my sketch-book and overtaken my escort, with whom I rode triumph antly back into Ascoli, where my absence had been the cause of much anxiety, and my fate was even their being eagerly discussed.

My friends with whom I usually sat round the chemist's door, were much exercised by the reserve which I manifested in reply to the fire of cross examination to which I was subjected for the next few days; and English eccentricity, which was proverbial even in this secluded town, received a fresh illustration in the light and airy manner with which I treated a capture and escape from brigands, which I regarded with such indifference that I could not be induced even to condescend to details. "It was a mere scuffle; there were only four; and, being an Englishman, I polished them all off with the box,"—and I closed my fist, and struck a scientific attitude of selfdefence branching off into a learned disquisition on the pugilistic art, which filled my hearers with respect and amazement. From this time forward the sentiment with which I regarded my air-gun underwent a change. When a friend had made me a present of it a year before, I regarded it in the light of a toy, and rather resented the gift as too juvenile. I wonder he did not give me a kite or a hoop, I mentally reflected. Then I had found it useful among Italians, who are a trifling people, and like playthings but now that it had saved my life, and sent a bullet through a man's heart, I no longer entertained the same feeling of contempt for it. Not again would I make light of it,—so potent an engine of destruction which had procured me the character of being a magician I would hide it from human gaze, and cherish it as a sort of fetish. So I bought a walking-stick and an umbrella, and strapped it up with them, wrapped in my plaid; and when, shortly after, by a fortunate fluke at billiards, at which I was a proficient. I had won enough from the officers of my fr end's regiment, which soon after arrived, to buy a horse from one of them, I accepted their invitation to accompany them on their brigand-hunting expeditions, not one of them knew that I had such a weapon as an air-gun in my noisesson Our modus operandi on these occasions was as follows: On receiving information from some proprietor that the brigands were threatening his property, it was impossible to get intelligence from the peasantry, for they were all in league with the brigands;

Why use a gritty, muddy, disagreeable article when Hood's Sarsaparilla, so pure so clear, so delightful, can be obtained in league with the brigands;

the farm in question. The bands were all mounted, and averaged from 200 to 400 men each. It was calculated that upwards of 2000 men were thus engaged in harrying the country, and this enabled the Neri to talk of the king's forces engaged in legitimate warfare against those of Victor Enmanuel. Riding over the vast plains of the Capitanata, we would discern against the sky-outline the figure of a solitary horseman. This we know to be a picket. Then there was no time to be lost, and away we would go for him helterskelter across the plain; he would instantly gallop in on the main body, probably occupying a masseria. If they thought they were strong enough, they would show fight. If not, they would take to their heels in the direction of the mountains, with us in full cry after ing species of warfare, partaking a good deal more of the character of a hunting-field than of cavalry skirmishing. Sometimes, where the ground was hilly, we had Bersaglieri with us; and as the brigands took to the mountains, the warfare assumed a different character. Sometimes, in default of these active little troops, we took local volunteers, whom we found a very poor substitute. On more than one occasion when we came upon the brigands in a farm, they thought themselves sufficiently strong to hold it against us, and on one of these the cowardice of the volun teers was amusingly illustrated. The band was estimated at about 200, and we had 100 volunteers and a detachment of 50 cavalry. On coming under the fire of the brigands, the cavalry captain, who was in command, ordered the volunteers to charge, intending when they had dislodged the enemy to ride him down on the open; but the volunteer officer did not repeat the word, and stood stock-still, his men all imitating his example. "Charge! I say," shouted the cavalry captain; "why don't you charge? I believe you're afraid!' "E vero," said the captain of volunteers, shrugging his shoulders. "Here, take my horse-you're only fit to be a groom; and you, men, dismount and let these cowards hold your horses, while you follow me,"-and jumping from his horse, the gallant fellow, followed by his men, charged the building, from which a hot fire was playing upon them, sword in hand. In less than a quarter of an hour the brigands were scampering, some on foot and some on horseback, out of the farm-buildings, followed by a few stray and harmless shots from such of the volunteers as had their hands free. We lost three men killed and five wounded in this little skirmish, and killed six of the brigands, besides making a dozen prisoners. When I say we, I mean my companions; for having no weapon, I had discreetly remained with the volunteers. The scene of this gallant exploit was on the classic battle-field of Canna. This captain, who was not the friend I had joined the day after my brigand adventure, was a most plucky and dashing cavalry officer, and was well seconded by his men, who were all Piedmontese, and of very different temperament from the Neapolitans. On one occasion a band of 250 brigands waited for us on the top of a small hill, never dreaming that we should charge up it with the odds five to one against us-but we did; and after firing a volley at us, which emptied a couple of saddles, they broke and fled when we were about twenty yards from them. Then began one of the most exciting scurries across country it was ever my fortune to be engaged in. The brigands scattered—so did we; and I found myself with two troopers in chase of a pair of bandits, one of whom seemed to be the chief of the band. A small stream wound through the plain, which we dashed across. Just beyond was a tributary ditch, which would have been considered a fair jump in the huntingfield: both brigands took it in splendid style. The hindmost was not ten yards ahead of the leading trooper, who came a crop-per, on which the brigand reined

DEAR SIRS: We were having an occasion to put a valuable horse in condition for a rice. In giving the horse his work, he threw out a curb, in copsequence of which I would have sold him, at that time, for three hundred dollars ($300), or less. Hearing of Ellia's Spavin Cure Limiteent, I tried it with good results. In two weeks the curb was gone and the horse going sound. I put him to condition again, and in two mouths we sold him for as many thousands and we valued him worth hundreds when he had the curb. The borse is at present boarding at our stable and being driven on the road every day. We can safely recommend your spavin Cure Liniment for all bone diseases and callous lumps of any kindl if properly used.

The other trooper, who was a little ahead of me, for safely over. I followed stit. In stocker trooper the had fired his carbine into the brigand's horse, and down they both same by the run. We instantly remed up for leave there was no chance of evertaking the remaining brigand, and the trooper was in the act of cutting down the man as he struggled to his lest, when to my horror I recognised the lovely teatures of Valeria. Stay, man I shouted, throwing myself from my horse, into a woman touch herit youndare! said then seeing the man's eye gleam then seeing the man's eye gleam with indignation I added, brave soldiers, such as you have proved yourself to be, do not kill women; though your traducers say you do, do not give them cause to speak truth. I will be responsible for this woman's safety. Here, to make it sure, you had better strap us to-gether." I piqued myself exceed-ingly on this happy inspiration, whereby I secured an arm-and-arm walk, of a peculiar kind it is true, with Valeria, and indeed my readiness to sacrifice myself seemed rather to astonish the soldier, who hesitated. However, his comfade, whose horse had been shot in the ditch, now came up, and seconded my proposal, as I offered him a

"How on earth am I to let you escape, dear Valeria?" I whispered, giving her a sort of affectionate nudge: the position of our sims prevented your squeezing hers, as I could have wished, and the two troopers kept behind us, watching us, I thought suspiciously.

"It is quite impossible now—don't attempt it," the answered;

"perhaps there may be an opportunity later."

"Was that Croppo who got to seretch my nose with this hand that is tied to yours, which I can thus bring to my lips."

I accomplished this manuare rather neatly, but parties now came straggling in from other directions, and I was obliged to give up wh spering and become circumspect. They all seemed rather astonished at our group, and the captain laughed heartily as he rode up and called out," Who bave you got tied to you there, caro mio?"
"Croppo's wife. I had her tied to me for fear she should escape; besides, she is not bad-looking." "What a prize!" he exclaimed We have made a tolerable haul this time,—twenty prisoners in all —among them the priest of the band. Our colonel has just arrived, so I am in luck—he will be de lighted. See, the prisoners are being brought up to him now: but you had better remount and present yours in a less singular fashlon." When we reached the colonel we found him examining the priest. His breviary contained various interesting notes, written on some of the fly-leaves. For instance :-"Administered extreme unction to A—, shot by Croppo's orders : my share ten scholi.

"Ditto, ditto, to R hung by Croppo's order: my dime two "Ditto, ditto, to S., roasted by Croppo's order, to make him name an agent to bring his ransom: overdone by mistake, and died—so got nothing.
"M—, and F—, and D three new members, joined to day : confessed them, and received the usual fees." He was a dark, beetle-browed-looking ruffian, this holy man; and the colonel, when he had finished examining his book of prayer and crime, tossed it to me, saying,-"There that will show your friends in England the kind of politicians we make war against. Ha! what have we here? This is more serious." And he unfolded a piece of paper which had been con-cealed in the breast of the priest. This contains a little valuable information," he added, with a grim smile. "Nobody like priests and women for carrying about political secrets, so you may have made a valuable capture," and he turned to where I stood with Valeria; "let her be carefully searched."

Now the colonel was a very ompous man, and the document he had just discovered on the priest added to his sense of self-importance. When, therefore, a large, carefully folded paper was produced from the neighborhodd of Valeria's RUSKIN'S WOLKS

Secrete a drawing like that on her person and found in the spring my wife got all ran down and could not cat anything; passing your the window, and I got a hottle. Friter she remember Issachar was likened to an ass between two burdens. It that case it probably emanated fro the state of the sta

My meeting with Vuleria on this occasion was too touching and full

My meeting with Valeria on this occasion was too touching and full of tender passages to be of any general interest. Valeria told me that she was still a bride; that she had only been married a few months, and that she had been compelled to become Croppo's wife against her choice, as the brigand's willwas too powerful to be resisted; against her choice, as the brigand's willwas too powerful to be resisted; but that, though he was jealous and attached to her, he was stern and ordel, and so far from winning her cruel, and so far from winning het love since her marriage, he had rather estranged it by his lits of passion and ferocity. As may be imagined, the portrait, which was really very successful, took some time in execution, the more especially as we had to discuss the possibilities of Valorica constant. sibilities of Valeria's escape.

"We are going to be transferred to morrow to the prison at Foggia," she said. "If, while we were passing through the market-place, a disturbance of some sort could be created, as it is market-day, and all the country people know me, and are my friends, a rescue might be attempted. I know how to arrange for that, only they must see some chance of success." A bright thought suddenlystruck me; it was suggested by a trick I wonder what is the cause of the confusion, but instantly take allvantage of it to escape." "Trust me for that, caro mio. "And if you escape, when shall we meet again?". "Iam known too well now to risk another meeting. I shall be in hiding with Croppo, where it will be impossible for you to find me, nor while he lives could I ever dare to think of leaving him; but I shall never forget you"—and she pressed my hands to her lips—though I shall no longer have the picture of the donkuy to remember you by," "See, here's my thotograph; that will be better," said I, feeling a little annoyed -foolishly, I admit. Then we strained each other to our respective hearts, and parted. Now it so happened that my room in the locanda in which I was lodging overlooked the market-place. Here at ten o'clock in the morning I posted myself—for that was the hour, as I had been careful to ascertain, when the prisoners were to start for Foggia. I opened the window about three inches, and fixed it there: I took out my gun, put eight balls in it, and looked down upon the square. It was crowded with the country people in their bright-coloured costumes, chaffering over their produce. I looked above them to the broad campanile of the church which filled one side of the square. I rooked and one side of the square. I receded a step and adjusted my gun on the ledge of the window to my entire satisfaction. I then looked down the street in which the prison was situated, and which debouched on the square, and awaited events. At ten minutes past ten I saw the soldiers at the door of the prison form up, and then I knew that the twenty prisoners of whom they formed the escort were starting; but the moment they began to move, I fired at the big bell in the campanile, which responded with a loud clang. All the people in the square looked up. As the prisoners entered the square, which they had to cross in its whole breadth, I fired again and again.

The bell banged twice, and the people began to buzz about. Now, I thought, I must let the old bell have it. By the time five more balls had struck the bell with a resounding din, the whole square was in commotion. A miracle was evidently in progress, or the cam-panile was bewitched. People began to run hither and thither; all the soldiers forming the escort gaped open-mouthed at the seeple as the clangor continued. As soon is the last shot had been fired, I looked down into the square and saw all this, and I saw that the prisoners were attempting to escape, and in more than one instance had succeeded, for the soldiers began to scatter in pursuit, and the country people to form themselves into impeding drowds, as though by accident, but nowhere could I see Valeria. When I was quite sure she had escaped, I went down and joined the crowd. I saw three prisoners captured and brought back; and when I asked the officer in command how many had escaped, he said three—Croppo's wife, the priest, and another (To be continued.)
