CLEVELAND'S NOMINATION.

The nomination of Cleveland appears to be quite satisfac ory all round.

The Democrats and reasoning which the reader who turns to the editorial page expects and should find, he upon the contrary meets with a foul emanation copied from some obscure sheet written probably by some black guardly penny-a liner, who under the liberty allowed a free press, thus proves too clearly and for some time watched the laborers engaged in the work of repair with much interest.—Advertiser.

In the S5th sonnet he says: tongue-tied Muse in manners iolds her still, While comments of your praise, richly kompil'd. Reserve their character, with golden And precious phrase by all the Muses I think good thoughts, while others write good words.

And, like unletter'd clerk, still cry Amen 1 To every hymn that able spirit affords. In pdlish'd form of well-refined pen." Again, in the 86th sonnet, Shakespeare thus writes :--"Was it the proud full sail of his great Bound for the prize of all-too-precious That did my ripe thoughts in my brain Making their tomb the womb wherein they grew?"

The identity of theme and purodse of the other poet and of Shakespeare is by these statements established beyond the possibility of reasonable doubt. This identity is unfruestionable. It is admitted and acknowledged by those who suppose that Shakespeare's theme was the glory of Lord Herbert or Lord Southampton, or the sublime excellence of some unknown lord or lady of tender age and of miscellaneous accomplishments. This identity is confessed even by those who suppose that the lady in black who ligures in the concluding series of the Sonnets was literally and presaically the beau-tiful and fascinating, but the faithless and gross mistress of Shakespeare and of Shakespeare's friend But while perhaps all the critics, irrespectively of their conjectures in relation to the nature, purpose, and destination of the Sonnets, admit that the other poet's theme or purpose was the same as Shakespeare's none of them seem to have dreamed that Dante was the other poet referred to by Shakespeare, and that Shakespeare's purpose or theme was the same as Dante's. Without applying to the criticism to which Shakespeare's Sonnets have been subjected the poet's words in Sonnet clii. "All my yows are oaths but to misuse

And all my honest faith in thee is lost,' -let us mark carefully the terms in which Shakespeare describes the theme or purpose of the other poet. For by doing this we shall learn not a little respecting the nature, theme, and purpose of all the Sonnets. Shakespeare calls the writings of the other poet "comments of praise (lxxxv.) They are intended for the praise of him whose raises" are sung by Shakespeare in all the Sonnets-"comments of your praise." Who, then, is this exalted and glorious one, whose transcendent excellence is the theme of both these poets? He is the one of whom Shakespeare says in the 83d sonnet— "There lives more life in one of your fair eyes

Than both your poets can in praise devise. He is the one who cannot be loved to excess, or in relation to whom love can never degenerate into idolatry, "Let not my love he call'd idolatry, Nor my beloved as an idol show, Since all alike my songs and praises h To one, of one, still such and ever so." Sonnet ev.

"all" Shakespeare's "songs and praises" are directed, according to his expostulation addressed to his Muse in the 100th sonnet. Where art thou, Muse, that thou for gett'st so long

To speak of that which gives thee thy might? Spend'st thou thy fury on some worth Darkening thy power to lend base sub jects light? Return, forgetful Muse, and straight redeem In gentle numbers time so illy spent Sing to the car that doth thy lay And gives thy pen both skill and

To this one, Shakespeare's Sonnets are all addressed. For they are "all" "to one," and "o one": and that "one" is ever the same-still such and ever 80."

'Still constant in a wondrous excellence ! Therefore my verse, to constancy con-One thing expressing, leaves out differ

Again Shakespeare calls the writ ings of the other poet not only "comments of praise," but also "hymns," composed and sung in honour of the "one" to whom, and of whom, he sings in all the Sonnets. | What, then, does Shakespeare mean by the word "hymn, used in the 85th sonnet? This word is interpreted by himself in the second line of the same sonnet. Hymns are there called "comments of praise." And the phraseology and figures used in connection with the word "hymn" seem intended to indicate that the word itself here, as in all places in which it occurs in Shakespeare's writings, denotes "a solemn religious song —that is, a song distinguished not only from "worthless songs" (c.), but also from songs other than those of a sacred or religious kind. "I think good thoughts, while others write good words. And, like unletter'd clerk, still er To every hymn that able spirit affords In polish'd form of well-refined pen Hearing you prais'd, I say, ''Tis so 'tis true,' And to the most of praise add some But that is in my thought, whose lov to you, Though words come hindmost, his rank before."

The writings of the other poe referred to are comments of praise they are "hymns," or solemn religious songs, dedicated to the All above goods sold by same theme as that to which the Sonnets are consecrated by From this description of the

learn from Shakespeare himself that his Sonnets are "hymns"-"comments of praise" | solemn and religious songs in honour of the "one" who is ever the same. Apart altogether from the identification of Dante as the other poet or hymn-writer, the light reflected from Shakespeare's de-scription of the writings of that poet serves to guide us to the true nature, purpose, and design of Shakespeare's Sonnets. For in accordance with what is said of the comments of praise and hymns of the other poet, is the description given by him of his own Sonnets. In the 102d soinet, he compares the "lays" or sonnets of an earlier time in his new love and life to the "mournful hymns" of Philomel in early summer; and in the 29th sonnet, which sounds like "a cry from the depths," he thus rises hope and triumph :— Yet in these thoughts myself almost Haply I think on thee, and then my Like to the lark, at break of day arising. From sullen earth, sings hymns a For thy sweet love remembered such That then I scorn to change my state with kings." What is that somet itself but a hymn rising out of darkness and sorrow, and entering into light and oy? It reads and sounds like a poetic paraphrase of the words of Augustine:

out of dejection and sorrow into heaven's gate;

wealth brings,

"These mortifying reflections would of necessity sink me into despair, if Thou didst not interpose, according o Thy wonted goodness, and, in the midst of my lamentations and deep distress, support my drooping soul and assuage my anguish with the prospect of mercy when I stand most in need of it. Thou dost lift up my sornowful wailings and my deep sighs by transporting my sad soul above the lefty hill-tops to the sunny heights, where Thou dost set before me a table richly furnished for the refreshment of the weary and the joy of the dis-consolate. This revived and filled with delight, I forget my many mis-cries; and, lifted above the heights of the earth, I find true rest and peace." A quotation from Augustine may, to some readers and critics, appear as foreign to the sentiments ex-pressed in Shakespeare's Sounds as the identification of Dante as the other hymn-writer and poet referred to will appear strange and incredible. But there are more things in Shakespeare's Sonnets than have been dreamt of in the philosophy of conjectural and prosaic critics.

Shakespeard describes the purpose of the other poet as twofold, namely, (1) to set forth the praises of the one to whom, in the Sonnets, Mayor's Office, Railway, N. J., June 21st, 1884. Shakespeare's muse is dedicated—

A better spirit doth use your name And in the praise thereof spends all his and (2) to gain for himself posse ion of the one whose praises Bound for the prize of all-tdo-precious you." This also was Shakespeare's pur pose; for while it may be said that both Dante and Shakespeare intended that their writings should serve a manifold purpose, or be subservient to many great ends, yet the main purpose of both these poets was to celebrate the praises of what Sir Philip Sydney, in his Defence of Poesy, calls "the immortal beauty—the goodness God, that giveth us wits to ceive and hands to write." other words, Dante and Shakespeare made it, in their " new life, their main purpose to glorif God, and to enjoy Him for ever.
