of the ornamental water in the pleas ure-grounds of the Hall. There was no name upon it, and no clue was The day of Sir Victor's funera emember. The rain descended in torrents, the wind wailed and moaned through the trees. Some weeks afterwards I heard that an old gypsy woman had forced her way through the crowd of mourners, and had stood looking down into the grave where poor Sir Victor slept.
There was no will. Kate would allow no hand but her own to touch her husband's papers. She must have found some strange revelations there, for at times her grief was pitiful to see. Little Paul was now master of Release It was arranged that, as soon as affairs were settled, Kate and her child should leave the scene of their sorrow, and go abroad for a time.

They did so. And, all together, we once more resumed our happy Venetian life.

Two years passed away, and still we lingered in our sunny home by the blue sea. We heard constantly from England; but nothing had been discovered as to the dreary tragedy of Erlesmere Hall. People were beginning to forget it, or to speak of it as a thing of the past. At first among ourselves it had been a constant theme. Kate did not avoid all men-tion of her grief; she often spoke of her dead husband, and even in his praise. Little Sir Paul prattled away about "papa"; but I do not think he retained much recollection of him. Allan Charlton wrote at last to say that he thought it was time we re turned—he had managed my father's affairs during his absence. So in the spring we went home again.
