Those Two Little Words

Interpretation of the two words "national defense" is amazing. No dictionary, thesaurus or encyclopedia ever devoted to any other phrase the abundance of meanings which legislators and special groups have succeeded in squeezing out of these two.

Without a doubt, the defense program or the state of emergency which the President has declared has been a heaven-like manna to those who for years have been unsuccessful in efforts to seize a good slice of the taxpayers' money for some "pork barreling" project.

Now the sky's the limit. Suddenly, programs and proposals which previously were viewed as luxuries or unneeded public expenditures have been decorated with the red, white and blue patriotic theme and orated as extremely vital to the future existence of democracy.

A national emergency is recognized and all of us are being called upon to make sacrifices. Already we have been asked not to be wasteful. Millions have been appropriated by Congress and millions more will be ere this nation is fully equipped and prepared for an emergency. Still, the abundance of capital should not be cause for scattering public funds hither and yon on projects that are not absolutely necessary.

The Florida Ship Canal has been booted about the Halls of Congress for some years. Florida's favorite sons in Washington have repeatedly made desperate attempts under one guise or another to secure millions to dig the big ditch. They have all been unsuccessful. But, presto! Suddenly the ship canal turns up as one of the strong pillars upon which this great democracy of ours rests.

And then marching right along beside it with equal emphasis on its great national importance is the construction of the deep water St. Lawrence canal. Incidentally, canals seem to be quite a favorite with some of the defense spenders.

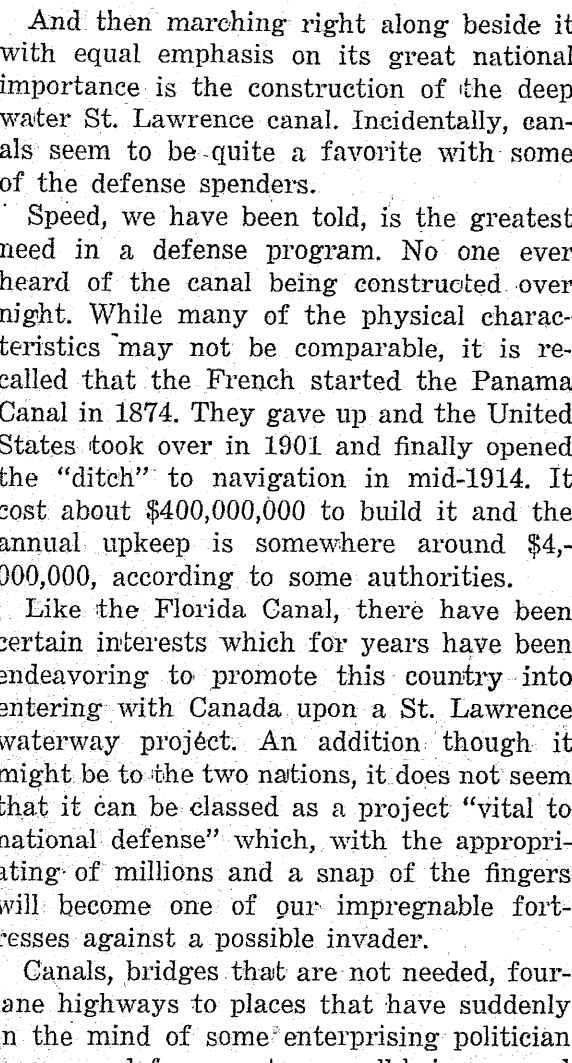

Speed, we have been told, is the greatest need in a defense program. No one ever heard of the canal being constructed overnight. While many of the physical characteristics may not be comparable, it is recalled that the French started the Panama Canal in 1874. They gave up and the United States took over in 1901 and finally opened the "ditch" to navigation in mid-1914. It cost about $400,000,000 to build it and the annual upkeep is somewhere around $4,000,000, according to some authorities.

Like the Florida Canal, there have been certain interests which for years have been endeavoring to promote this country into entering with Canada upon a St. Lawrence waterway project. An addition though it might be to the two nations, it does not seem that it can be classed as a project "vital to national defense" which, with the appropriating of millions and a snap of the fingers will become one of our impregnable fortresses against a possible invader.

Canals, bridges that are not needed, four-lane highways to places that have suddenly in the mind of some enterprising politician become a defense center are all being ground out of Washington's spending grist mill.

Money is plentiful. The pork barrel never rolled out a sweeter tune to politicians' ears than it is today. Now, more than ever, the public should be thoughtful about those whom they elect to public offices and be watchful of their moves.

ESSEX COUNTY POLITICS

The views expressed in this column, are entirely those of the writer and not necessarily those of the Publishers or Editors of the Belleville News.

Nothing that has happened in years has so upset political career men as the appointment of Assistant Prosecutor Joseph Conlon to be chairman of the State Utilities Commission. The appointment was known only to four or five persons. Whether one of these was Senator Zink is not entirely clear. According to the story that appears most correct, Zink was scheduled to have a conference with Edison last Friday to discuss appointments, but Governor Edison was too busy to keep the date. If Zink knew about Conlon being named, he was simply told about it and was given no chance to approve or disapprove.

The same applies to the appointment of former City Engineer Costello of Newark to the Port Authority and Victor J. D'Aloia to the Water Commission. It is said around the Governor's office that Zink not only knew about the appointments but that they had his general approval. Members of the Senate deny this. So far Zink has said nothing for publication.

The implications of the Conlon appointment are so far-reaching that it merits more space here than would ordinarily be given to such a matter. A man high up in the councils of the Democratic party compared the appointments to "border incidents" that arise when one European nation plans to make war on another. According to his theory Edison is getting set to wage open war on Hague and the Conlon, Costello and D'Aloia appointments represented an initial skirmish. To support his theory this leader pointed to two known facts: first, that County Chairman James J. McMahon knew absolutely nothing about the appointments and is as mad as a raging bull about the way he was treated; second, that John Milton, the brains of the Hague machine, was so excited over the matter that his golf balls flew in every direction when golfing during the weekend.

But why should Edison select this particular moment to launch a campaign against Hague? My Democratic friend thought it was probably the opening gun in an Edison campaign to gain national recognition, with the possibility of being a presidential candidate in the background. But to me this does not seem as logical as the likelihood that Hague and Edison have broken over the matter of a constitutional convention.

Edison wants a convention more than he wants anything else. Up to now it has been assumed that Hudson and Essex would provide the nucleus for an Assembly resolution authorizing such a convention. It has been known all along that Senate concurrence could not be obtained. Has Hague now refused to supply the Hudson votes to get such a resolution through the Assembly? If this is the case, Edison has no choice but to fight Hague with every weapon at his command.

Laurence Torley Talks About Dogs

by Meador Wright

When the smooth fox terrier, Ch. Nornay Saddler, rolled up a record-breaking string of more than fifty best in show honors, and the cocker spaniel, Ch. My Own Brucie, went best of all breeds at Morris and Essex once and Westminster twice, pure-bred dog fanciers realized that a new era was starting — that the "kitchen-bred champion" had arrived.

Saddler and Brucie are the most widely known, but a survey shows that many of the dogs that have done a major share of winning at American Kennel Club fixtures were bred and raised in private homes.

It is also apparent that a person who owns a brood matron with a good family tree often has an advantage over the large kennels. There are two main reasons. The small breeder can choose almost any worthwhile stud that he figures is suitable, and when the litter arrives he is able to give it his whole attention.

Divided Attention
A large kennel, ranging in size from twenty-five to seventy-five dogs, often is too quick to use its own stud dogs, even when outside sires might be a trifle more desirable. Also it frequently happens that several litters arrive at about the same time, and this means a division of attention.

Furthermore, it is seldom possible in a large kennel for the owner to do all the work, and while those hired to work in dog-breeding plants may be industrious and capable, their ideas may not agree with those of the owner. Either way of raising puppies might produce good ones, but two methods cannot be employed successfully.

The large kennels also are forced to raise the puppies in pens in a kennel building. The

Demonstrating What Scouts Do

This week under the supervision of the Belleville Boy Scout Council more than 300 young boys will practically demonstrate what the Boy Scout movement attempts to teach growing youths.

How different in purpose and in action will be the martialing of these young boys from that which is now and has been taking place in dictator-controlled countries of Europe.

The camporee to be held at the Turf Bog Stadium is more than just a lark for youngsters who love to camp out. While not being in any sense militaristic, the regulations by which they will be governed will tend to teach them responsibility, ability to get along with other boys, development of independence and displaying through various events their knowledge of first aid, hike-craft, campcraft and other activities, all of which have helped to make the Scout movement the valuable asset that it is to any community.

A great amount of time and effort has been spent by men who are interested in boys and their development in preparing for the camporee. To them should go the credit for the event, the actual length of which will be small in comparison to the hours that they have spent planning it.

The Scout movement should be one of the town's more important activities—now more than ever before. It is one in which parents of growing young boys, even those of pre-Scout age, should be interested. The public will be welcomed at the camporee any time on Saturday. Those who are interested in what these boys are learning and the work they are doing will get real pleasure out of a visit.

Do Not Eat The Right Foods

Feeding a nation is one of the most important of an emergency program. At least three-fourths of the people in this nation do not have satisfactory diets. Agriculture Secretary Wickard told the National Nutrition Conference for Defense recently. He said, "We need to consume twice as much green vegetables and fruit, seventy percent more tomatoes and citrus fruits, thirty-five percent more eggs, fifteen percent more butter and twenty percent more milk."

Along the same line, Surgeon General Parran of the Public Health Service recommended the following minimum daily diet: one pint of milk for an adult and more for a child, at least one serving of meat, one egg or substitute, two green vegetables, two fruits rich in Vitamin C, bread and cereal, butter or oleomargarine and "other foods to satisfy the appetite."

It never occurred to us before, but some-

Progress Has Been Made, But —

Rapid strides have been made in arming this nation since a year ago when it was decided that the time had come for the United States to shed its indifferent, peace-believing attitude.

Still plaguing the expansion of the Army is the lack of equipment. Months ago when the machinery was set up for the mobilization of more than a million men through calling to service the National Guard and putting into action the Selective Service Act, we remarked that there were numerous disadvantages to calling a million men to the colors if the equipment would not be available so that they could learn how to use modern war weapons.

In many instances, this still holds true today. A nation-wide survey shows that there are 1,345,800 officers and men now in the Army ranks. This is gigantic in comparison to the Army personnel of a year ago of only 230,772. The ground forces now are made up of twenty-seven infantry divisions, four armored divisions that await full equipment, two and one-half cavalry divisions and five general headquarters tank battalions.

A year ago, the survey reports, the regular Army had only six infantry divisions and a cavalry division. In the National Guard there were eighteen infantry divisions and four cavalry divisions.

But, still plaguing the Army is the lack of motorized and mechanized equipment. Most of the tanks now available for training purposes are of the light type. Few of the big ones are off the production line.

Weapons valuable in basic training are available but there are still serious shortages in modern defensive and offensive equipment. The next ninety days, the OPM hopefully predicts, will see the end of this situation and the start of real production.

This is good news but what about many of the young men who will soon be completing their year of service, either with the National Guard or under Selective Service? While they have had a twelve-month sample of Army life and have had training with basic equipment, they still are unacquainted with the weapons which they would use in event of a war.

The mobilization of manpower has been well done but the bottle-neck is still in the production of defense materials. Some think this nation is ready for war if there should be one. Figures do not show it. No Army ever fought a battle without guns and equipment — especially in this day.

man who owns a lone brood matron usually keeps her and her puppies right in his home. In this way she is assured of constant care, and her puppies at all times have contact with human beings. This factor is very important in the rearing of puppies.

backed by both residents and merchants. He offered both the Public Service and Garden State the opportunity to submit a suggested route. Garden State did. Local consent has been given for the line and the application is shortly to go before the Public Utilities Commission for consideration.

How Did Nutley Do It?

From Mrs. Cephas Brainerd
48 Van Houten Place
To the Editor of The News:

There is much progress in Belleville in the opening of new businesses opposite the Town Hall and other proposed construction.

Although this is progress, it is also competition for merchants already in town, but there is no one to forbid the new stores from selling to the residents, or the residents from buying.

When the Garden State Bus Line, however, started a "little brown bus" to North Newark, which was a great convenience to people living midway between Washington and Union avenues, the Public Utilities Commission, to protect the Public Service from "competition," effectively stopped residents from using the bus, in spite of protests.

I have recently noticed, in a Newark newspaper, that our neighbors in Nutley are to have a Garden State beltline to give transportation within the Town, (in spite of the usual protest by the Public Service). What a pity Belleville cannot have a similar convenience.

Perhaps — if we ask nicely — Nutley will tell us how it can be done?

(Ed. Note—Nutley's effort to obtain an around-town belt line was prompted by the efforts of its Public Safety Director, A. Theodore DeMuro. His suggestion was

P. S. Operating Revenue Up, But So Did Expenses

Continuing to reflect increased consumption of electricity and gas by New Jersey industries, due partly to defense contracts, operating revenues of Public Service Corporation of New Jersey and subsidiary companies for the month of April and for the twelve months ended April 30, 1941 increased, compared with corresponding periods a year ago. But revenue deductions, represented by operating expenses, maintenance, depreciation and retirement expenses and taxes, also went up.

Operating income for the month of April increased, compared with April last year but operating income for the twelve months ended April 30, 1941 decreased, compared with the twelve months ended April 30, 1940.

For the month of April, this year, operating revenues were $12,372,733.03 and revenue deductions $8,775,627.58, compared respectively, with $11,652,445.60 and $8,318,353.05 for April last year. Operating income was $3,597,105.45, or $263,012.90 more than in April, 1940. Income deductions were $1,127,903.89, or $69,110.25 more than for April, 1940, leaving a balance available for dividends and surplus of $2,449,993.12 as against $2,147,981.08 for April, 1940, an increase of $197,012.04.

by PEGGY PATTERSON

A recent discussion in the nation's leading magazine devoted to parents and their children points out that a generation ago the menace of comic strips was as anxiously regarded by parents as are the undesirable movies and radio serials of the present era. Those earlier parents felt sure that the fast developing cartoon serial with its primitive characterizations and slang expressions spelled doom to the cultural instincts of their children. We have lived to see the survival of that generation and, while there is still nothing very favorable to be said for any form of literature which is under par culturally, still it cannot be said that the comic strip was responsible for any particularly disastrous outcome.

Rather it is a negative than a positive influence. And this deduction also covers the current problem of movie and radio influences. These things, fortunately, are not so much positive forces (barring certain extreme cases, of course) as they are stop-gaps, interlopers in the reaches of the child's mind which has far greater potentialities than that of mopping up any repetitious adventures. They do not so much exert their influence in forming a pattern of conduct for the child's behavior as they do in constituting an excuse for his not forming any desirable pattern at all.

Based on the ideas expressed by psychologists, and on our own observations, we feel that parents do well to be concerned about the caliber of the literature and amusements indulged in by their children. They would also do well to hold back opposition to some of the more harmless activities until they are entirely sure that they understand their children's reasons for indulging in them and the actual amount of harm which follows.

Make Him Isolationist

First of all, we are told, the child cannot successfully be prohibited indulgence in these things which are peculiar to his age-group; and, more than that, are the outward expressions of his particular human cycle. Any act of isolation from his contemporaries, and the denial of certain comics, movies and radio programs constitutes this, is a step toward setting up in him a pattern for isolation of other qualities which will draw a social misadjustment.

The child belongs more to his own environment, and that means the whole area of social custom into which he is born, than he ever can belong to yours which preceded his birth by some years. He will, therefore, not be a well rounded individual unless, to some extent at least, he tastes the variety of human manifestations. Perhaps you will argue this point saying that you cannot imagine raising the danger of exposing your child to any and all the earmarks of his day. Suppose the vulgar qualities predominate? Suppose he has the misfortune to find his contemporary pursuits on a rather low level? Fortunately the answer can safely be that this situation is really never the case.

For the literature and amusements which we consider the most harmful for our young people are always in a state of transition. Instability is intrinsic to them. The survivors, the stable ones such as classic literature and drama, are always with us and almost no one escapes their influence be it ever so indirect.

Much Overlooked by Child

Again, comes reassurance for your fears in the result of research which proves that the child overlooks much, very much, of the qualities we so dread. He enjoys the long-dragged-out serial with its soaring dramatic heights and interminable periods of suspense because they represent to him the rhythm of living. "This," he says, to himself, "is what it is to be frightened; this is how it feels to wait for something mysterious to happen; this is the thrilling feeling of having accomplished the impossible!"

And he apparently enjoys the vicarious experience of hearing these things enacted over and over again, much as the infant attempts to repeat interminably his attempts to stand alone, at his toes into his mouth, throw the same object down on the floor many times when he discovers the power and purpose of his members.

The growing child, we are assured, is so engrossed in these sensations that he is actually not making a conscious effort to note or remember the slang phrases, the far-fetched expressions which quail our inner instincts when we read or overhear them. The child overlooks the true significance of these things; even if he mimics them there will always come a day when they will appall him as they fall loud and clear on the silent air at an inopportune moment. They are truly temporary things. Like the simple contagious diseases of early youth, they are best suffered then. Attacks of them, like ventures into undesirable reading or drama, are not genuinely serious unless they come late in life, unless they are misplaced.

It is therefore recommended by experts that you withhold some of the opposition which you may have heretofore felt justified when your youngster asks for a comic book or permission to attend a movie thriller. Remember that he will overlook much that you are dreading; and remember too that you can set to work positive forces which will do more than you could ever do single handed to counteract the portion of harm that remains.

Give him his comic book and gradually start giving him other books—real books which will subtly aid him in his transition to the dignity of life as contrasted to the vicarious expression he has coveted.

Let him accompany the crowd to movies of their choice, but also take him yourself to selected

H. S. Equestrians Hold Annual Picnic-Ride

Waving aside such things as automobiles for the fun of riding a horse, the seventeen girl members of the High School Riding Club held their annual ride on Tuesday afternoon.

Leaving from the Pearl Brook Riding Academy in Brookdale, the girls cantered along the tow path of the old Morris Canal to Paterson where they took to the highway and headed up into Garrett Mountain, Passaic County's park site. They had a picnic supper and returned home in the early evening.

Miss Margaret Leahy of the school faculty, the club's instructor, was in charge.
