

THE DEPARTED POET

To Be Laid to Rest in a Tomb
Selected by Himself.

IT IS NEAR THE PLACE HE DIED.

A Cast of the Face Taken Before the Body
Was Placed in the Casket.

The last scene at the death bed of the "Good Gray Poet" of the South Sea of Long and varied career—A Farm Boy, Printer, Soldier, Army Nurse, Government Employee and a Poet—He Died a Bachelor.

CAMDEN, N. J., March 28.—Before the remains of Walt Whitman were placed in the casket, Albert Alken, of Philadelphia, made a cast of the "good gray poet's" face.

The body will be placed in the recently completed tomb in the Mount Pleasant cemetery, on the outskirts of Camden, a spot selected by Mr. Whitman when he was enjoying his usual health, and where he spent many times during the construction of the tomb.

The poet's wish is that the remains of his mother, which were buried in the same grave, and those of his father, buried in Brooklyn, be exhumed and deposited in the tomb. The poet's wish was complied with by those to whom he entrusted the request.

The last hours of the venerable poet were peaceful and he was conscious to the last moment. Only an hour before he died he called his housekeeper and signified that he would like to change his position in his bed; she aided him to do so, and he died peacefully.

The matter will be brought to the attention of the court by a petition for writ of habeas corpus, and the regular form, setting out the facts of the case, and the grounds for relief, will be filed.

The action is based on the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court that absence of the accused during rendition of verdict is an error.
