

HOW

How to be Friends with Your Son-in-law.

It would seem a harder task to be friends with one's son-in-law than with any other relation, for it is hard to see the daughter who has been the pet and caressed and irresponsible darling of the home from first life, whose mother was everything, to her new home, where her new duties and new life put her upon the footing of a new being. No man can or is expected to treat his wife as the mother treated her daughter, and it hurts a mother's heart to see her daughter become accustomed to life. Her new relation is antagonistic from the beginning, more from habit of hearing motherhood-law rebelled and abused than anything else, and he is determined that she shall not dominate him. The only way in which she can hope for success is to remember the difference between a husband and a mother, close her ears to complaints and let her daughter to faults and avoid giving advice or taking sides in the little things that are bound to arise to disturb the peace of the household. Every man has a dim desire to be treated as a son-in-law, and mother, and only time will wear it away. The mother-in-law has a very different role to play, particularly if obliged to live with her son-in-law. She is often unjustly blamed and made to feel herself an intruder, her wishes and motherly desires to take the lead in household matters, which she understands and her daughter does not, are resented. She is usually suspected and is probably slighted by her son-in-law. It is no wonder that bitter enmity is engendered. The only safe rule is to be friendly to her in-laws. It is to allow her to do as she pleases as completely as possible and to avoid presenting to her daughter, who has married her daughter. Above all, she should never know anything about her son-in-law's shortcomings or her own. She should never call her an accomplice, but it is her only hope.

Give him an ounce of fresh meat every day, and you will have an amount of red pepper with your food during the winter. Give them plenty of grain, lime and water, and keep them by themselves.

How to Clean Lamp Chimneys.

Unless chimney is very badly smoked it is really very much better to wash them. Nothing is better as a cleaner than an old newspaper. First cut off the chimney; then breathe into it and twist a piece of the paper into it until the inside is polished. Then the outside with the paper after moistening with the brush. Many chimneys are broken in the wood basin, and besides particles of the towels with which they are wiped frequently cling to the chimneys and
