HOUSEHOLD RECIPES.

(We have been requested by some ladies to devote a little corner in our paper for the exchanging of recipes for cooking, baking, etc. Any lady having anything she thinks would be of interest to others is invited to send it to us, and we will give it place under this head.)

PULLED BREAD.—To make pulled bread take an ordinary loaf from the oven when about half baked, pull it in to pieces about the size of an egg, throw them on tins and bake to a rich brown. Leave the oven door open when you take the pan out, and put coal on the fire to deaden it before you begin to work on the bread.

DISINFECTING BY SULPHUR.—To disinfect clothing it should be lightly sponged or sprinkled with water, containing well-mingled milk of sulphur, in the proportion of a teaspoonful to a pint of water, and then ironed with a flat-iron, heated to a temperature sufficient to volatilize the sulphur without burning the clothing.

Embroidery silks should be dipped in weak ammonia before using in order to set the color, and articles embroidered [illegible] in worsted [illegible] never be washed in anything stronger than bran and water. A little ox-gall mixed with the water will keep the colors from running [illegible]

JAMAICA GINGER BEER.—[illegible] of Jamaica ginger [illegible] quarts of water, one ounce of cream tartar, one pound of sugar [illegible]

WHAT A FLY DID.

Mr. James Howard, of Walker, married an interesting young lady named Symonds about a year ago, and they have lived cosily and happily together ever since. But the other morning, at breakfast, an inquisitive and hungry fly dropped down from his perch on the ceiling, and, stretching his legs, began skirmishing around for his breakfast. He crawled slowly around Mr. Howard's coffee cup once or twice, sniffing the delicious aroma and wondering how he could manage to get a drink, when his foot slipped, he lost his grip, and in a moment more was floundering around in the liquid. His struggles attracted the attention of James, and he pushed [illegible] the table. The unfortunate fly alighted in a wet and bedraggled condition on Mrs. H.'s plate. She [illegible] grabbed him and flung him back into her husband's plate. James gazed steadily at her a moment, and seeing blood in her eye, deliberately picked up the fly, and, with a hand trembling with suppressed rage, threw it back on her plate. [illegible] The young wife, bursting into tears, seized her bonnet and rushed from the house to the residence of her parents, vowing she would never come back, and James went out to the barn, swearing to himself. [illegible] and they [illegible] are rendered miserable by the single misstep of a fly. On such small things do our destinies [illegible]

A Void.

Ah! those tiny dimpled fingers,
That soiled the window pane,
They will no longer vex us,
Ah, nevermore again.

We hear no more a childish voice,
Prattling in baby glee,
We list in vain a rippling laugh,
[illegible]

We hear no more the pattering feet,
Of tiny baby Will,
No tongue can tell how great the void
[illegible]

Oh, weary mother, tired, and vexed,
I almost envy thee.
[illegible]

Oh, empty hands, oh, aching heart,
Oh, void that naught can fill,
More welcome far the trials of
Of little baby Will.

Mishaps of a Picnic Party.

"Why, Tom, what is your serious objection to picnics? I remember it used to be a very favorite amusement with you, and now the bare mention of a picnic throws you almost into convulsions."

"Why, the fact is, Charley, the last picnic I went on, which was some time before last, will last me a life time, and that [illegible] me so dear I have made up my mind never to go on another."

"I have heard something before of a rather queer time you had on that occasion, so, as we have neither of us anything better to do this morning, suppose you tell me something about it."

"Well, Charley," said Tom, lighting a cigar, and handing one to his friend, "I don't know but it will be just as good a way as any of passing away the time until dinner. As you say, I used to be very fond of picnics, and many a rare day's sport I have found at them, but the most uproarious day I ever knew was on the occasion of that last party. As we most always had the luck of having one or more of the disagreeable ones, we were very particular in selecting our number, and a more glorious party was never made up than the thirty-two ladies and gentlemen comprising the party in question. The arrangement was that our four musicians and all the edibles should be taken out by an express wagon, and await our arrival at the old King's Bridge Hotel, while our party should assemble at 8 a. m. at Bill Crawford's house on thirty-first street, and proceed from thence to King's Bridge in sixteen light wagons.

"The morning came clear and warm, and at the appointed hour all were assembled at Bill's house, anxiously awaiting the arrival of himself and Jenny Hanson, whom he had gone for. Half an hour passed, and as the missing ones were not in sight, we concluded to go in different directions in search of them, appointing a rendezvous at the Fifth avenue gate of Central Park. An hour after, we all met at that point, but Bill had not been found, and as Jenny was our star vocalist (she and Dave Morrow having been practising for the occasion), we were in a quandary; but finally concluded to go on, and let Bill and Jennie follow.

"We hadn't gone more than a mile when we saw Bill's white horse coming toward us. He had gone to his own house by some unheard of route, and not finding us there, had started in pursuit. Not finding us at the Boulevard House, he had come back to look for us. We were now all right, and were about as pretty a procession as one would wish to look at. We were all in good spirits; the ladies looked fresh and rosy, and all were bent on enjoying themselves. As the weather was too warm for fast driving, and no one was willing to take the rear and the dust, it was agreed to have just one brush to the Boulevard House, and the order in which we arrived there we were to keep from there to King's Bridge.

"The word was given and off we went. There were some fast nags in that crowd, and it was as pretty a race as could be desired. On we went, thundering along the road, and long before we reached the house we could see the hostlers and waiters in readiness for our company. Bill Jones, with his wife, was the first in, and close on his heels came Mr. and Mrs. Arthurs. Your humble servant, having in company that glorious specimen of womankind—that leader of all 'ton,' Nellie Charles—making the third. The rest came straggling in—Dave Mackey with Miss Stewart, and Charley Edwards with Fanny Lent bringing up the rear. Some champagne disappeared, and then we took the road, again in the order agreed upon, and in due course of time reached the old King's Bridge Hotel, having stopped on the road occasionally.

"Here we found boats in readiness to convey us down to 'Cold Spring,' as Sam Greene designates a most lovely spot on the 'Spuyten Teufel,' belonging to his grounds, and, without exception, the most eligible spot for a picnic within fifty miles of old Gotham. Here on this smooth grass we laid our table, and in a short time were deeply engaged in doing justice to the good things before us. Dinner over, we found seats around upon the rocks, and champagne in hand, the woods rang for an hour with the most exquisite melody, for we had many fine singers among us. Jenny sang us some beautiful Scotch ballads and Dave Mackey regaled our ears with his rich voice in his favorite, 'Would I were a boy again.' Then we had sparkling duets, and wound up with a grand chorus of 'The day when we went gipsying,' which might have been heard over half the island. The musicians having by this time satisfied their appetites, we cleared away the fragments and took our places for dancing, our party being just sufficient to make four sets. We hadn't been dancing more than half an hour before it was evident a heavy shower was about to enliven our proceedings. As we had sent the boats back to the hotel with orders to call for us at five o'clock, there was no escaping that way, and, as it was a rough climb over the rocks to Sam Greene's house, we concluded to seek shelter under the trees and make the best of a bad bargain. In a few moments the rain began to come down in perfect torrents, and in less than five minutes had penetrated our leafy covering and drenched us to the skin. We now considered it safer to abandon the trees and take to the open ground, as the lightning looked rather dangerous. Such a party! A dying man would have laughed to see them. Sixteen women, who, a few minutes before, were looking as if just taken from the band-boxes, were now huddled in the centre of the open ground, some laughing, some crying, some terrified, some enjoying the whole matter exceedingly, but all looking one mass just fresh from the wash.

"Fifteen gentlemen were there, some laughing at the dripping beauties, and [illegible] just for all the world, as if each one was an animated water-spout. [illegible] who was never known to be disconcerted at any [illegible] he was certainly making himself remarkably at home. Bill had discovered that a good glove that was [illegible] feet off the [illegible] and looked [illegible] up the oysters they had planted in the Cold Spring water. [illegible]

"This broke the spell of terror which was over the ladies. [illegible]

"When the last petticoat had disappeared below deck the gentlemen retreated to the woods, and by dint of the wringing process divested their clothing of a number of gallons of water without at all improving the set of either coats or pants by the operation. When we got back to the shore a most singular vision met our gaze. The ladies were there, but where were their fair proportions of such an hour before? One glance shot revealed the secret—the sail was covered with crinoline and flimsy handkerchiefs and hosiery, and a variety of other things, too numerous to mention, had been pinned fast, and hoisted up to dry.

"On our approach the ladies beat a hasty retreat below. A parley was sounded, and an agreement entered into, that the male bipeds should remain on shore, while the ladies disposed themselves behind the sail, in order to suit themselves, or, rather the very small portion of their wardrobes not hanging to the sail. [illegible] now occupied our time until the boats came, and the ladies were declared in a fit state to meet the gallant knights.

"When we arrived at the landing we had about a hundred yards to walk to the house, and on the piazza of the hotel were gathered all the boarders and the numerous parties who had hidden out from the city. We were forced to face the music and march up, but such a queer-looking regiment as defiled along that narrow road hasn't often been seen. [illegible]

"Well, we put the best face we could on the matter, and boldly marched up the steps, and into a private room, where mine host had all waiting for us a meal that would have tempted an anchorite, and, as we were all sharp set after our weary adventures by flood and field, we very soon did ample justice to it. After dinner Charley Edwards came in, bearing a very formidable-looking bottle, and insisted on all hands round partaking, to prevent any of our number from taking cold. This was done, and thirty-two such faces as that party made at the thirty-two doses couldn't well be equaled. When Charley was questioned as to what his wondrous medicine was composed of his answer was [illegible]

"As it was getting quite cool when we were ready to start for home, and our clothing was more or less wet, the landlord suggested the propriety of our taking a number of [illegible] boarders' overcoats to envelope the ladies in and prevent them from taking cold. The coats were kindly loaned, we promising to send them home next day, and away we started for home, but a very different looking set of people from those who arrived there a few hours previous. The ladies' laces and ribbons looked as if they had been worn for forty years, and our collars and shirt bosoms were in a badly dilapidated state, and our coats and pants looked as if they had been made on the cork-screw pattern, the effect of the wringings to which they had been subjected. But our hearts were light, and we were determined to enjoy ourselves, and we didn't mind our appearance.

"We soon found that riding fast in damp clothes was a cool proceeding, so the women were put into the overcoats, and the men of our party were glad to enrobe themselves in the bright red and blue blankets which had been sent with the horses. In this costume we reached High Bridge, and Nellie Charles proposed stopping for a promenade on its top. No sooner said than done, and such a party. I thought we couldn't be beat when we left the boats, but now each fair damsel was enveloped in a huge, great coat, and every gallant knight in a bright-hued blanket. The bridge was filled with visitors, and I am sure we must have been taken for a detachment of wild Indians, and very varied were the remarks upon our appearance, as we made our way through the throng, who opened, right and left, to let us pass, the most charitable of which were certain that we were either 'drunk or crazy.' But we were just at that point when [illegible] for anything, and we passed across and back, enjoying the adventure highly.

"We had some tight racing over the road, and entered Broadway just before dark. Just as we were about separating for our homes, Nellie came forward with a proposition to go down to a fashionable restaurant in our original costume. We turned our faces down Broadway, exciting as much attention as the entrance of a menagerie into town, and many of our acquaintances we saw upon the sidewalks, who seemed strangely puzzled as they wondered where they had seen our countenances before. We arrived at an early hour, when it was thronged, and pulling up at the door, surrounded by a large crowd who had collected to see us alight, we made our way, blankets, overcoats and all, to the extreme end of the room. Not finding seats there, we turned down on the other side of the room, and the first person I saw was Mary Morley, to whom, you know, I was at that time engaged. My recognition was met with the most chilling hauteur, and, out of pure revenge, I sat down and devoted myself to Nellie Charles in the most assiduous manner, until Miss Morley swept by as she took her departure.

"A few evenings after I called upon her, and asked her to set a time for our marriage. I was told that she could not marry a man who saw fit to get intoxicated and masquerade in company with such a hoydenish party as the one she saw me with a few evenings before. Explanations were of no use, her prim ideas had received a shock she could never recover from, and, from that day to this, we have never met, and I was a loser of a clear eighty thousand she had in her own right. That's the story, and now you know the cause of my aversion to picnics."

"Well, Tom," said Charley, at the conclusion, "you have a pretty good reason, but you know the old adage about there being 'as good fish in the sea as ever was caught.' Why don't you find another charmer? Nellie Charles for instance."

"Just you keep your eyes open, Charley," answered Tom, "and see what you will see. My heart wasn't very badly broken by Mary, but I lost too much by her to go on any more picnics."

SPAIN'S MOST BEAUTIFUL CATHEDRAL.

There are larger and more massive cathedrals in Spain, but that of Burgos is the most beautiful. No mere outline can afford any adequate idea of its architectural richness. The order is Gothic, the purest, the most harmonious, and the richest of the thirteenth century. The principal facade has three rich ogival portals, and above them two open, graceful towers, not unlike the one at Strasbourg, but of a reduced height. In the centre is the dome of the lantern, and in the rear the tower of the Constable's Chapel, all magnificently ornamented with statuettes of saints, Gothic canopies, filagree pinnacles and other airy elaboration. The interior is in the form of a Latin cross, 341 feet in length, and 213 feet in width in the widest point. The cloisters, the Archbishop's palace, and several chapels surrounding the cross, somewhat complicate the plan. Twenty massive octagon pillars from three naves, but the effect of the full expanse is crippled by the inevitable choir and high altar in the centre. The pre-eminent feature of the interior is the lantern, which, with its four pillars and lofty dome, is grand and rich beyond all efforts at word-sketching. The Chapels of the Constable and of Santiago (St. James the Elder) are gems of the ten, and the former is of especial richness. In all there are sixty tombs in the cathedral, including several of the old royal families and distinguished ecclesiastics of Burgos.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

LIFE IN PARIS.

Many American ladies who are so situated as to be independent now make their homes in Paris. How cheaply ladies can live in the prettiest and merriest city upon earth is a secret known only to some of themselves; but two art students who resided together and clubbed resources in one of the streets near the Luxembourg, managed comfortably on less than three hundred dollars a year till better times came to them. They had their breakfast from a cream and coffee shop (cremerie), a very different place to a cafe, and their dinner from a small eating-house, frequented by artists, where a moderate sized beef-steak cost them only seven sous. Their lessons and lecture on art cost them nothing, and their only professional expenses were incurred for the materials of painting and models. Ladies without special business in Paris, but who yet desire to reside there, may create for themselves a peculiarly quiet and honorable home in such places as the Abbaye-au-Bois. This, like several similar establishments, is a convent where ladies can rent apartments and enjoy the protection of the sisterhood under conditions not too onerous. But cooking at home is much dearer than boarding out or arranging with the nearest hotel or eating house keeper to be served ready dressed. It is difficult to explain the astonishing expense of home life in Paris, in view of the unquestionable fact that hotel prices have not varied for the last thirty years. Thirty years ago, the hotel price of a lady's breakfast of tea or coffee and bread and butter was one franc and a half; it costs one franc and a half now. The price of hotel bed-rooms and the cost of hotel servants also remain stationary.

It is stated that the treatment of melted zinc with from ten to twelve per cent. of chloride of ammonium will harden it considerably.

Eighteen families in New York count up $240,000,000 among them.

SCIENTIFIC.

The inhabitants of the towns and villages along the river Maas, says a Netherlands journal, are dependent on its waters for domestic and drinking purposes—a water which is turbid, does not become clear on standing, and produces, in those not accustomed to its use, a diarrhoea, sometimes accompanied by dangerous symptoms. Singular enough, analysis fails to reveal the cause of this property. Some time ago, however, it was ascertained by an Amsterdam chemist that perchloride of iron added to this water—the same being also found applicable to far more foul waters experimented upon—rendered it wholesome and even agreeable to use. To one liter of the water is added 0.032 gram of the dry salt dissolved in pure water, the liquid, after stirring, being allowed to stand for some thirty-six hours; on a large scale, a small quantity of carbonate of sodium is subsequently added to neutralize any free chlorhydric acid. The precipitate formed by the addition of perchloride of iron and carbonate of sodium contains a large quantity of organic matter; and analysis shows that the only addition to the inorganic constituents of the water is one part of chloride of sodium to 40,000 parts water.

AT a trial of chronometers at Geneva, lasting fifty-two days, some instances of remarkable accuracy were developed. The watches were kept at an observatory, being placed successively for seven days, in different horizontal and vertical positions, and tested with heat and cold. The trials were classed under three heads, namely: First, the mean variation of the watch from day to day, this not to exceed six-tenths of a second; second, the mean departure in each of the positions, this not to exceed two seconds; and, third, the error of compensation produced by the change of temperature, the maximum not to exceed two-tenths of a second by degree of thermometer. Eighty-four chronometers were entered, twenty-nine of which fulfilled all of the conditions. The prize was taken by a Locle manufacturer. The average variation of this prize timepiece was .26 of a second per day; the mean departure in one of the seven positions was .43 of a second, the error of compensation, .61 of a second, and the variation of the running after and before the tests of heat and cold, .33 of a second.

FOR some time past a simple kind of ventilator has been successfully employed in some of the Welsh coal mines, to keep the workings free from firedamp. The apparatus consists virtually of two great blowing cylinders, each of twenty feet diameter, set at each end of a working beam, to which a reciprocating motion is communicated by a steam engine. (Instead, however, of the cylinders being bored and fitted with pistons, they are formed of sheet iron, like a gasholder and gasometer, and are made tight in like manner by water joints. When the gasometer is raised by the beam, the air is sucked through valves from the mine, and, when the gasometer is again depressed, this air is expelled into the atmosphere. By this simple means the foul air is continuously pumped out through a shaft appropriated to that purpose, while the pure air enters through other shafts and openings, and is made to course through all the workings before its final debouch at the ventilator, by which it is removed.

EXPERIMENTS show that the air in contact with the external surface of a cast-iron stove may be come charged with a proportion of carbonic oxide equal to .0007 to .0013 of its volume. Tests made on small animals show that carbonic oxide has the property of expelling a part of the oxygen contained in the blood—in fact, that the small amount of .0004 will cause the expulsion of .45 of the oxygen of the blood. Though the sheet-iron stoves are less dangerous on this account, they are not entirely harmless, as they are open to the objection of a sudden elevation of temperature of their external surface, and of then decomposing the carbonic acid of the air. It has long been known as a fact in science, that iron at a red heat decomposes carbonic acid, takes a portion of its oxygen, and transforms it into carbonic oxide. The amount of carbonic oxide formed is notably less in a moist than in a dry air, thus showing the advantage of vessels filled with water on stoves and furnaces.

THE name "orohellograph" is given to a new and curious panoramic instrument, invented in France. As described, it consists of a camera, the place of the ground glass forming the base, and the lens looking up perpendicularly to the sky; over the lens is placed a silvered mirror, half globe-shaped, completely circular on its plan and parabolic through its vertical section. The result is that an image of all surrounding objects reflected from this half ball-shaped mirror is received by the lens always in focus thereon, and transmitted thereby upon the sensitive plate underneath, with its surface forming a right angle with the axis of the lens and circular mirror; by this means, a circular panoramic view of the horizon is obtained, as seen from the station the orohellograph occupies. It is also stated that the angles and heights can be measured from the views taken at two or more stations by this means.

What a blessing to the household is a merry, cheerful woman—one whose spirits are not affected by wet days and little disappointments, and whose human kindness does not sour in the sunshine of human prosperity. Such a woman, in the darkest hours, brightens the house like a piece of sunshiny weather. The children go to school with a sense of something great to be achieved; husband goes out into the world in a conqueror's spirit. No matter how he is annoyed abroad, at home he is sure to find rest.

The Burlington Hawkeye says that if all the peanuts that are crunched and munched at American theatres and concerts during the affecting scenes and the softest passages were placed in a heap, the pile would measure 1,459 miles in circumference at the base, and the apex of the pyramid would go through the sun and stick up a mile and a half on the other side.

Some time back the play of Hamlet was being performed at a provincial theatre. In a scene with Polonius the crafty old courtier asks, "Do you know me, my lord?" and the Prince responds, "Excellent well; you are a fishmonger." On hearing this an old woman in the pit stood up, and, shaking her fist, shouted excitedly, "Well, and s'posin' he is—that's better than play-acting, any day!"

The Governor of Kwang Tung recently applied to the Chinese Government for permission to erect a memorial structure in honor of the filial devotion of a young daughter of a magistrate in Canton. Her father fell ill, and she devoted herself to nursing him. At the end of six months his malady increased, and the daughter cut a piece of flesh from her arm and mixed it with his medicine. The remedy, however, proved ineffectual, so she vowed to sacrifice her life to his, and poisoned herself on the day that her father died. The Government has sanctioned the monument.

A MAN WHO NEVER SLEEPS.—Mr. C. D. Shanks, of Parkersburg, West Virginia, is a tall, straight, robust man, between fifty and sixty. He has not slept for fifteen years; he never intends to sleep again, and he firmly believes that he will live to be a hundred years old. He says he takes no medicine, nor has he had a day's illness in fifteen years. He eats all he wants to eat, and has three meals a day, smokes, chews, and drinks, but does not sleep.

At Conway, in front of a small beer maker's shop, the English landlords find the following description in their own language:—"Humble beer sold here." After long and studious thought he may attribute the snobbery of his numerous patrons to the respect they are anointed with diligence.
