Warren, she was constantly bringing This pride was not lead, and would his image before her mind. The pleas-have to be overcome before he could ure of remembering that pleasure was always attended with pain. But Holon had an all-powerful panacea to mental troubles in ambitious work. There was enough to keep her mind and hands busy. Then all her hours of recreation were spent with her afflicted brother. If she found herself dreaming ambitious dreams in which Warren Stuart was her hero, she immediately banished them from her mine, and applied herself industriously higher household duties. Warren frequently of an evening came to the rear porch, with a book or paper, for he said it was the coolest place, being on the east side of the L, which formed the kitchen; but somehow Warren never read his book or paper, but spent his time in talking with Helen or amusing Amos. The little cripple grew quite fond of him, and used to call him frequently against the protests of his sister, who blushed profasely in spite of herself when War, ren came. The afternoons were usually em-ployed by Helen in sewing for Mrs. Scuart, for she was "handy with the ngedle."' Nearly every afternoon found Wheren there also, unless his father and mother devised some plan to keep him away. Poor Helen—she was blamed; although she did nothing to encourage the young physician. Mr. Stuart said he thought when he seut Warren to college it would make him know more than ordinary mortals. but where a pretty face was concerned he was about as big a fool as any other boy. Deluded man, did he suppose love could be educated out of the human heart, and did he suppose he could add one atom of wisdom to a love-sick youth? Warren's parents did not forbid his frequent attentions to Helen in direct words; they were too wise for that; but they did every thing they could to discourage them, and tried to find something for him to do to keep him away from the kitchen. Mr. Stuart grew sullen, and even cross, to the little crippled boy whom he had fondled and petted before. Mrs. Stuart, godd woman, was kind to both Helen and her little brother. She knew it was not the poor girl's fault. Helen was quick to perceive that Warren's manner toward her was causing his parents uneasiness, and apprecinted the fact that a hired girl for a daughter-in-law fell far below the ambition of the Stuarts. She kept away from church for two Sabbaths. and when she went on the third, Warren. who had set parental vigilance at defi ance, overtook her and accompanied her to church against her protest. On the way home she sought to avoid conversation with him, but as they paused at the rear gate he caught her hand and said : "Helen, I love you, I can't help it; I don't care if the whole world knows it. Do you love me in return ?" She cast a frightened, appealing glance in his face, full of mild entreatv. and said : "Oh do not talk so, it isit is wicked," and bursting into tears broke away from him, and ran to the

"I thought they got it all at once." Warnen laughed at his sister, and told her she would learn better when she was older. He then offered to help his brother Clarence carry the trunk to the house, but the young farmer said that doctors were not fit persons to handlo luggage, and, throwing the heavy trunk upon his own broad shoulder, he walked in the house with it. The return of a youth to his home after a long absence is always pleasant There was so much to talk about on this evening that Warren was kept busy. The college, the graduating speech he had delivered, which Rose wanted him to repeat for the "edificahome had to be thoroughly discussed. Then with supper came Pete, the peddler, who, in traveling around the it convenient to stop over night with farmer Stuart. Pete was an old and intimate friend of the family, and Mrs. Stuart purchased many ribbons, laces, handkerchiefs, and also table linen, Pete unslung his wares and merchandise at the door with as much freedom and familiarity as if he were a member of the household. He greeted Warren's retuin in a hearty manner, declaring, in his laconic way: "Fil be doggoned, boy, if you don't begin to look like a doctor, sure enough. All ye lack is some beard on yer face. He returned to the house and crep softly up to his room. Though he slept but little that night, he was less restless than before he took his moonlight walk.

The next morning he was feeling dull and heavy. His brothers had long been up, and were feeding and currying their horses, while their breakfast was preparing. The minister and his wife were going to Newton that morning and Warren was the person selected to take them.

"I guess if yer goin' to town to-day I'll jist go 'long to take the train for ; Chicago," said Peddler Pete; "ye see my stock's runnin' low, an' I had better replenish jist a little."
