HOW SHE VOTED IN ENGLAND. One day, soon after we had taken house in Bristol, a young man knocked at the door, with a list of names in one hand and a black bag in the other. He read my mother's name from the list, and producing a folded paper from the black bag informed her, that an election for Guardher voting paper, which she was kindly requested to fill up as it would be called for in a day or so. When opened the paper appeared a far more legal and formal locument than anything of the kind which we have seen in the United States.

It was numbered, it bore the voter's full name and address; it told who would deliver, and who would collect it; gave the voter accurate directions for filling it in.

Bristol. Each candidate aired his opinions, pledged bimself to support certain measures, appealed to the voters of his ward to vote for him, and if he chanced to be up for re-election, thanked them for former favors in the advertising columns of the daily papers. Scarcely a day passed without some one calling with, or sending by post some pamphlet, or other paper, praising one candidate at the expense of another: some constanting a wonderful array of facts and fancies, others were mere slips of paper with such statements as this, "See here, voters: our candidate gave fifty pounds to such a charity, his opponent gave only a pound."

Rach party sent a copy of a voting paper, and on the day of the election, hired cabs, and other vehicles were to be seen in all directions placarded with, "Vote for vyour respected citizen. Mr. So and So;" or "Vote for the Workingmans friend Mr. Somebody Eise." So you may be sure voters were as eagerly sough; after as in the United States.

ng, I believe I will walk over to the pollwith great indifference on the moraling of the election. I don't think the average English female voter is a very strongminded women's rights kind of individual. She doesn't seem to consider voling her forte: perhaps its a good thing that her mind is more occupied with lovers, housekeeping arrapgements, and babies. If you ask a woman if she intends to vote, she looks rather bored, and answers carelessly, "I don't think so, I may if I am sent for, and it's not too much trouble: I'l see."

The English method of voling appears to be identical with, or perhaps is the parent of the Australian plan, so much talk. "Everything about the polling place, a public hall, was," said my mother, 'quiet and jorderly; from outward appearances a stranger would not have known what was taking place within its walls. A policeman guarded the doors; on entering a polite official inquired her name and address, and looked to see that she was properly registered as a voter. That being right, she received a voting paper, and this closure, where she found writing materials; against her candidate's name she as at the other election, placed a cross (1), then signed and folded her paper, and this time dropped it into a real ballot box. and the measure convicted, but not converted, How office one of the work of the core of th

P. often appear in the newspapers, or how came it that all the voters of a place as was the case in the arge city of Gloucester, were disfranchised few years ago. "No one can know how you vote," is often said to a timid voter supposed to have private reasons for not wishing the public to hear which party he dayored. In suspicious minds a grave doubt of the truth of this might arise. Some right wish to know if those who examine and count the votes are always true to pledges of secreey, and either quite ignorant of who the voters may be, whose sames they see, or are perfectly free from party feeling. Would it not be better if the tending voter received from the official who gives out the voting paper a simpler form of ballot stamped with the name of the polling place, and the date of the elecclosure provided, were there allowed to SEVEN BEALS. place a x opposite his chosen candidate's closure, and not a private stamp, lest it make a cross differing in form from the
