Inauguration A Century's Growth Out-

George Washington was the hero of the most successful and least destructive revolu-tion recorded in history. His inauguration was the beginning of a new era, as well as the inception of a new government. Indeed, the chief novelty of the new government consisted not so much in its form, for that contained little that was new, but the vital now stands forth an era far more important than that of Magna Charta or the Petition of The dye being Rights, its centennial will, therefore, be celebrated in New York city with all the enthusiasm of the first inauguration added to the confidence born of a hundred years' success. President Harrison will arrive by the same route, and will pass over the same scenes

The Irish Celtic and Protestant, while the Palatine Gervulley of Virginia did not in any sense constitute an alien political party.

Necessity compelled some sort of union from the first, but it was self evident that no one of the local religious elements could pre-vail over all the others, and thus by a most complete divorce of church and state under the old government, while the anomaly was presented of a union of the two in some of the states till long after the adoption of the present purely secular national constitution.

Jealpusies inherent in the religions of the original stocks were very slowly eliminated, and those growing out of local interests in trade and navigation were most persistent of all. Hence the instincts of the people looked to a man of impartial temper to hold the just balance of the constitution between state rights and centralization - between the south, the west and the east-between the in-
