Kicking the habit

The graduating members of the American Lung Association's Freedom From Smoking Clinic went out to hunch last week to celebrate. Some celebrated being smoke free, the first time in years, and others celebrated becoming more aware of their smoking habits and cutting down. I belong to the last category.

Peggy and Carol completed the course as non-smokers. They both said they still had urges for a cigarette smokers. They both said they son had diges for a eiganetic and found it difficult to refrain from smoking. But they both also said they were determined to stay away from cigarettes, and as much as they could, from circumstances that promoted smoking. They sit in non-smoking sections of restaurants now and exercise when the going gets tough. They've learned alternate coping strategies to use in place of reaching for that cigarette — things like doodling, switching from coffee to tea, sitting in another room to read the paper, drinking a glass of water while talking on the phone. Carol said she would be interested in becoming an instructor, possibly for a hearing-impaired class.

Mary and Sheila are still struggling. They go for a few days without a eigarette, then start again. Peggy, our instructor, said that was O.K. Sooner or later, they would quit altogether. She said it was O.K. for me, too. I am still smoking under ten cigarettes a day, down from two and a half packs a day. She said that maybe it was just not my time, but there's still hope. She gave me literature to study at home, to keep reminding me that I can do it.

at home, to keep reminding me that I can do it.

My family has been very supportive. They keep telling me I can do it and they tell me they are proud that I at least cut down. I also want to thank all of the readers of these columns for their kind words and support. The water meter man came over the other day and mentioned the articles. He said he had also quit smoking. I was walking in the park the other day and passed a fellow walker who said "Glad to see you don't have a cigarette in your hand." One of the girls at bowling said she showed these articles to her mother to try to get her to stop smoking. It has meant a lot to me, your concern, and I am confident that I will finally quit.

Nursing extern program enters seventh year at Rahway Hospital

Nursing students concluding their junior year of school can spend this summer practicing at Rahway Hospital as participants in the Nursing Extern Program, which enters its seventh successful year.

The training program allows students to work in an acute care setting on a one-to-one basis with a registered nurse on the hospital staff, and gives them an opportunity to return to this familiar setting upon graduation

The program bridges the gap from student to professional status, preparing the student for practice upon graduation and reducing the stress and anxiety usually associated with this transition," said Kay MacVicar, R.N., Program Coordin-

"The positive practical experience students receive working as externs tran-slates into confidence when they start their first job," she said. The program also gives students the reassurance of having a job upon graduation, with the added bonus of being able to return to a familiar en-
