

What Uncle Intended

He Had an Odd Way of Bringing It About

By SARAH BAXTER

An old man lay on a sickbed, pale and emaciated. At a table close by, with writing material before him, sat a man with that expression on his face which is best described as a half-angry, half-pleading, half-pleading, half-pleading.

"Read to me those letters, Mr. Cutler," said the sick man.

Mr. Cutler read over two or three letters, one of them amounting to over $100.

"Now," continued the testator, "I wish you to put the following in legal language: My nephew, Edward Henry, son of my brother of the same name, and my niece, Lillian, the daughter of my sister, have been engaged to be married. I desire that they be notified of my death at the same hour and minute that whatever I may have left shall be divided equally between them."

The attorney spent nearly half an hour over the item, then read it to the sick man, who appeared to be satisfied with it and said:

"Now write, I direct that my will remain in the keeping of my attorney, Elwood Cutler, who is directed to keep secret this provision and to announce it to my nephew and my niece at the same moment, giving an advance warning of five minutes to each."

"Who, may I ask," said Mr. Cutler, "is to decide whether I carry out your intention faithfully?"

"The court," said the testator, "is the court."

The attorney immediately went to work to express the provision in legal language and when it was finished read it to the testator, who, after making a few minor corrections, signed and sealed it. Then the lawyer called all that he had written, called in witnesses, who signed and sealed it, and then returned to the sick man, who, after a moment's reflection, said:

"Two days after the date of my death, I direct that my attorney, Elwood Cutler, be notified of my death at the same hour and minute that whatever I may have left shall be divided equally between them."

"On the morning of the 15th of September, Miss Cutler drove up to the office of Mr. Morgan & Hyde and was shown into a private sitting room. The door was opened and in walked her cousin, Edward Henry, and sitting on the sofa, she saw her nephew, who was looking at her with a very good man's face.

"Where is my uncle?" she asked.

"He is dead," said the nephew, "and his body has been buried in the cemetery."

"Where is my uncle?" she asked.

"He is dead," said the nephew, "and his body has been buried in the cemetery."

A Good Match

But Not One Usually to Be Expected

By F. A. MITCHELL

One of the many peculiarities of the human nature is to place little value on what we do easily. A man will have unlimited ability, for instance, as a teacher, but he will not make much of it, unless he is made to feel that he is doing something that he should be able to accomplish. He is ambitious to play the piano, and it worries him that he cannot sell one note more than another. There is a worse phase of such weakness than this. A man with a single gift, not recognizing its value, will squander it by making it his hobby, his life, his ambition, his only interest. He will not use it for a career, and in a few years he will be a failure. He will not use it for a career, and in a few years he will be a failure.

Norman Alsop at school was a perfect scholar. When his report came to his parents there was a string of A's against every study. The school principal, who was a strict disciplinarian, told him that he was a failure. He was a failure, he said, because he was not a natural scholar. He was a failure, he said, because he was not a natural scholar.
